CHRIST'S EXPERIENCE OF GOD

PREFACE

THIS book, taking for granted the technical devices of preaching, goes straight to the heart of the Gospel to be preached and practiced:— the Gospel that Christ expects men to be great enough to make the good of all affected by their action, the object of their wills, as it is of the will of God.

The Christian is not a “plaster saint” who holds “safety first” to be the supreme spiritual grace; but the man who earns and spends his money, controls his appetites and passions, chooses peace or war, and does whatever his hand finds to do, with an eye single to the greatest good of all concerned.

Sin is falling short of this high, heroic aim; and the preacher’s business is to make men ashamed of it, as the low, mean thing it is.

The instant a man who has done wrong repents, God and all Christlike men welcome him back to their favor and fellowship.

To the Christian every secular vocation is an opportunity to express Good Will: and sacrifice is the price he gladly pays for the privilege.

The wise Christian preacher will not as preacher become the mere partisan on one side or the other of disputed questions of political, social, and moral reform : but will commend such Good Will and condemn such evil will as there is on both sides.

Christian character and Christian virtues come not by direct cultivation, but as by-products of Good Will expressed in daily life. The Church, a superfluous superstition when considered as an appendage to an untransformed secular life, or a preparation for an undefined happiness hereafter, is a precious and sacred instrument for transforming men and institutions into sons and servants of Good Will.

As the expert interpreter of the Gospel of Good Will : as the leader in the fight against all meanness and cruelty : as the restorer of the penitent : as the infuser of spiritual meaning into secular life : as the champion of costly sacrifice : as the challenger of social injustice and the non-partisan herald of social reform : as the officer of a church that derives its sanctity and unity from the efficiency with which it serves all forms of personal and social welfare, — the Christian minister has a mission beneficent beyond all others.

These lessons are drawn from and illustrated by texts and extracts from twentieth-century literature: not devotional, theological, evangelistic, or missionary books, but secular literature that is saturated with the essential Christian Spirit of Good Will.

For kind permission to quote these texts and lessons from "Contemporary Scriptures" I make grateful acknowledgments to the following authors and publishers:

Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, for "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" (page 1); Mr. Charles Rann Kennedy and Harper and Brothers, for "The Servant in the House" (page 162); D. Appleton and Company, for Thomas Mott Osborne's "Within Prison Walls" (page 80); The Houghton Mifflin Company, for John Graham Brooks' "An American Citizen" (page 108); J. B. Lippincott Company, for Charles Sarolea's "How Belgium Saved Europe" (page 135); Dodd, Mead and Company, for John Hopkins Dennison's "Beside the Bowery" (page 20); and The Macmillan Company, for John Masefield's "The Everlasting Mercy" and "The Widow in the Bye Street" (page 45); Jacob Riis' "The Making of an American," and "The Battle With the Slum" (page 191); and Winston Churchill's "The Inside of the Cup" (page 217).

These texts and extracts are introduced to show that this Gospel of Good Will is a Gospel which is being preached effectively in the poems and plays, the biographies and histories, the speeches and novels of the day, and should be preached in the pulpit.

In Chapters II and III, I have introduced a few passages from my book on "Sin and its Forgiveness." For some things put in, and for more left out, I am indebted to the criticism of Dr. Charles T. Burnett and Dr. Chauncey W. Goodrich.

Why the Gospel of Good Will? Why not the Gospel of God; the Gospel of Christ; or the Gospel of the Spirit?

Because for many of us God is a far-off, forbidding being; Christ has become sentimental and external; the Spirit has come to stand for something vague and mystical.

Readers of whom this is not true; readers to whom God is a Father whose trusted, wise benevolence makes the doing of hard duty a delight; Christ an ever present companion whose friendship makes unselfish living easy; the Spirit an inward guide whose perpetual suggestions make kindness of attitude and act a second nature; are advised to substitute for Good Will, wherever it occurs, the one of these more obviously personal terms which means most to them.

On the other hand, to those who find these terms beset with misconceptions, and are willing to risk apparent temporary abandonment of them, I think I can promise that at the end of our little journey they will come back to find these personal terms defined and deepened, expanded and enriched.

For Good Will is not an impersonal abstraction floating in empty air. It is the fundamental attribute of God; the essential nature of Christ; the characteristic quality of the Spirit: and whoever lives in Good Will thereby becomes a son or daughter of God, a brother or sister of Christ, a disciple and friend of the Spirit.

WILLIAM DEWITT HYDE.

BOWDOIN COLLEGE, BRUNSWICK, MAINE,
January 1, 1916.

INTRODUCTION

THERE are two approaches to the Christian life. One is the critical investigation of the traditions in which that life is historically enshrined. The results of this investigation are at first startlingly negative, and seem to take away the foundations of Christianity. Yet followed through they reveal underneath the foundation which they remove an even firmer foundation in the eternal ideal of Good Will which the prophets partially proclaimed, law negatively declared, Christ perfectly embodied, and the early Christians enthusiastically reproduced. One finds this admirably done in such a book as William F. Badè's "The Old Testament in the Light of To-day."

The other method is to ask, not through the critical examination of ancient tradition and ecclesiastical authority, but directly through the life and literature of the present day what are the supreme values which men are expressing and admiring in the plays and poems, the biographies and histories, the speeches and novels of this twentieth century. This method has all the pleasure and peril of plowing virgin soil on an unexplored frontier.

It neither denies nor affirms the results as such of Biblical and historical criticism. In so far as tradition proves false and authority unfounded, so long as we are true to our present highest ideal of Good Will, we can get along just as well without as with the historical tradition. And in so far as the verified tradition and our present insight coincide, each has reason to be grateful for the confirmation of the other.

Both to those whom criticism has robbed of cherished features of the traditional Gospel and to those to whom criticism has given back the essentials of their faith, the new method brings a positive and practicable Gospel. Wisdom is justified of all her children.

We are passing through a revolution in religious thought. The old terms remain: but with new meanings and new emphasis. The old views had at least the merit of clearness. The preacher knew precisely what to preach: and the layman knew how to put the preaching into practice. The new views have not yet become equally precise. Not every preacher who holds them knows how to make them clear to his congregation: and not every one in the congregation who hears them preached is quite clear about the manner of life for which they call.

As this book aims to make the new views as clearly preachable and as precisely practicable as the old, the natural introduction to them is a contrast, as sharp and as extreme as possible, between the old and the new views.

God used to be regarded as somewhat arbitrary: not deigning to justify his ways by the perfect standard of what human goodness at its best prompts us to say and do in our relations with our fellows: but laying down laws and penalties, drawing up plans and schemes, which seemed to have as their primary aim divine satisfaction rather than human welfare.

To-day our deeper grasp of the Spirit of Jesus, and our fuller appreciation of its great practical corollary, democracy, has taught us to measure God by at least as high a standard as that which we apply to ourselves. This makes God a Being altogether light in whom there is no darkness at all: not arbitrary will but Good Will becomes the essence of his nature: and when we seek to know His Will we ask not merely what was revealed to and believed by the harder hearts of twenty or twenty-five centuries ago, but what a Will which seeks the comprehensive best for each and all to-day expects us to be and do, in the concrete and complex situations in which we modern men are placed — situations infinitely more delicate and difficult than anything of which the most inspired of the ancients every dreamed.

Eight lectures cannot cover the whole of the preacher's message. I have selected and arranged in logical order the eight commissions which seem to me most vital.

The preacher's first task is to develop in his people the habit of asking in every relationship of life, not what is profitable, not what is pleasurable, not what is respectable, not what is lawful: but what does the Will that wills the best for all: — what does Good Will in this precise situation require. To train people to ask that question every day and hour of their lives: and once or twice a week to give them guidance and inspiration toward some of the answers to it, is the preacher's most comprehensive commission. He is not merely the repeater and commentator of a message once for all delivered to the saints: but the prophet of a message that is forever as new and original as the changing situations and unfolding capacities of men.

The thing the preacher and layman alike have to fight, then, is not sin in the old, abstract sense of defiance of an arbitrary God, disobedience of his sovereign commands, and disregard of the elaborate terms upon which he has offered us abstract salvation: but the meanness that seeks anything less than that best for all which Good Will is ever seeking; the selfishness which falls so far short of Good Will for all that it will take gain and pleasure for self, or self and friends, at cost of avoidable loss and pain for others and for all. To show mean and selfish persons how mean and selfish they are, and make them heartily ashamed of their greed and lust, malice and hatefulness, laziness and self-indulgence, censoriousness and hardheartedness, is the preacher's second commission.

Mean and contemptible as selfishness is, however, the selfish man is mean and contemptible no longer than he clings to his selfishness. The instant he is ashamed of it, and sorry for the injury it is to others; wishing that instead of the mean thing he said, or did, he had risen to the noble height of Good Will for all — that instant, not by special arrangement, but in the nature of the case, because we would do it ourselves, and God is at least as good as we are at our best, the man who has been mean and selfish is forgiven, and welcomed to the favor of God and the fellowship of all who in the Christ-like spirit share and serve Good Will. To assure the penitent of this free and full forgiveness of God, and to secure for him the practical, social expression of that forgiveness by all Christian men and women, is the preacher's third commission.

Good Will is not chiefly manifested for us once for all in miracle: or repeated for us in sacramental magic.

It is manifested in the life and character of Jesus Christ far more fully than in the alleged manner of his birth or the method of his resurrection: in the conduct and spirit of the daily lives of Christian men and women, far more than in ecclesiastical rites and ceremonies: and is to be manifested most acceptably and triumphantly in the transformation of all secular vocations into expressions of friendliness and service to all whom they directly and remotely affect. To show, not in technical detail, which for the most part is beyond his powers, but in aim and principle how to make each Christian man's vocation an expression of Good Will for him, in him, and through him for the benefit and blessing of the world, is the preacher's fourth commission.

Good Will involves not merely once for all in Jesus Christ, but perpetually and universally in every disciple who shares it, the sacrifice of whatever individual preference, pleasure or profit is inconsistent with it. Up to the limit of his strength and influence, so far as is consistent with maximum efficiency in his specific station and function, every Christian man must bear his share of the suffering incidental to a finite world of natural law and human freedom: and consequent on the perversity of individuals and the corruption and imperfection of civic and social institutions. Sacrifice is the cost of service: each form of service has its specific price in sacrifice: and to train his people to pay the price and make the sacrifice cheerfully and bravely, yet not excessively or unreasonably, is the preacher's fifth commission.

~ A man who makes his life expressive of Good Will thereby becomes not merely saved and assured of an abundant entrance into a future heaven: but becomes transformed by the renewing of his mind so as to show forth here and now that perfect and acceptable Will in specific traits of character and qualities of conduct. To show what these are, and how they come, not so much through explicit cultivation but as by-products of a mind and heart devoted day by day, year after year, to Good Will, is the Christian preacher's sixth commission.

The State, the economic order, the family and the international world order are spheres, not of supernatural conflict of God and the Devil, but spheres which are the resultants of much natural selfishness and an ever increasing volume of Christian Good Will. To live in them, patient with their imperfections so far as they are for the present inevitable; yet ever making his own contribution to them pure, and just and generous and beneficent: dwelling at the same time sorrowfully in the unavoidable injustices and oppressions, joyfully in the coming purity and justice and generosity and love of the world that is to be, and which all Christian men are helping to bring in, is his seventh commission.

The Bible, the Sabbath, the Sacraments, the Church, Missions and the Ministry are not as formerly considered, supernatural institutions of mystical and magical efficacy to work moral miracles independently of the transformation and coöperation of character: but they are useful and essential and therefore holy and sacred means for the cultivation, and propagation of Good Will. To make men appreciate and reverence them, not for their traditional and fictitious, but for their present-day and instrumental value, is the eighth of the preacher's commissions.

A man who signs himself "A Student In Arms," writing from the trenches in Flanders to the Spectator of December 18, 1915, describes so accurately the problem of the preacher, and the solution of it set forth in this book, that it may well serve as the conclusion of our introduction.

"The soldier, and in this case the soldier means the working man, does not in the least connect the things he really believes in with Christianity. He thinks that Christianity consists in believing the Bible and setting up to be better than your neighbors. By believing the Bible he means believing that Jonah was swallowed by the whale. By setting up to be better than your neighbors he means not drinking, not swearing, and preferably not smoking, being close-fisted with your money, avoiding the companionship of doubtful characters, and refusing to acknowledge that such have any claim upon you.

"This is surely nothing short of tragedy. Here were men who believed absolutely in the Christian virtues of unselfishness, generosity, charity and humility, without ever connecting them in their minds with Christ; and at the same time what they did associate with Christianity was just on a par with the formalism and smug self-righteousness which Christ spent His whole life in trying to destroy.

"The chaplains as a rule failed to realize this. They remonstrated with their hearers for not saying their prayers, and not coming to Communion, and not being afraid to die without making their peace with God. They did not grasp that the men really had deep-seated beliefs in goodness, and that the only reason why they did not pray and go to Communion was that they never connected the goodness in which they believed with the God in Whom the chaplains said they ought to believe. If they had connected Christianity with unselfishness and the rest, they would have been prepared to look to Christ as their Master and their Savior. I am certain that if the chaplain wants to be understood and to win their sympathy he must begin by showing them that Christianity is the explanation and the justification and the triumph of all that they now do really believe in. He must start by making their religion articulate in a way which they will recognize. He must make them see that his creeds and prayers and worship are the symbols of all that they admire most, and most want to be."

THE GOSPEL OF GOOD WILL

THE GOSPEL OF GOOD, WILL: CHRIST'S EXPECTATION OF MEN

"You have always taken it for granted, sir, in all our conversations, that I was a fine fellow, in sympathy with fine ideals. But that is not what surprises me: it is to find — that you are right." JEROME K. JEROME, The Passing of the Third Floor Back, p. 190.

OUR lesson for to-day is from "The Passing of the Third Floor Back"; the text is the remark of a Jew converted from cunning trickery to frank honesty. This play is the drama of conversion by expectation; regeneration by appreciation. It portrays the influence of THE STRANGER, who is Christ, on as unpromising a lot of persons as ever gathered together in a boarding house. The Prologue shows us a satyr, a coward, a bully, a shrew, a hussy, a rogue, a cad, a cat, a snob, a slut, a cheat, and a passer-by, THE STRANGER, — Christ.

In the Epilogue we meet these same individuals again, yet with all their objectionable characteristics gone: we meet them as a generous old bachelor; two pure lovers; a devoted husband and wife; an honorable Jew; an entertaining party; a self-respecting maiden lady; a generous rich aunt; an important person; the refined lady of the house, and THE STRANGER who now is the friend of them all.

How has THE STRANGER-FRIEND, the Christ, wrought this wonderful transformation? By seeing and revealing to each one of them his or her ideal. In the grasping lodging-house keeper he sees and reveals the generous lady she really is; unwilling to charge him as much as he is able and willing to pay. In a powdered, painted, giggling, gushing, silly simpleton he sees and reveals a "clever, witty, beautiful, graceful, comely woman, perhaps a little pale — there are white roses and red — with delicate features on which the sculptor Thought has chiselled his fine lines, giving to them character, distinction; her still-bright eyes unspoilt; with her fit crown of soft brown hair that time has touched with no unkindly hand."

To see how the change is wrought, however, we must give not mere extracts, but in two or three cases the whole conversation.

First, THE STRANGER has a friendly talk with Harry Larkcom, a low, ill-mannered, mercenary fellow who has just been trying to make an assignation with the servant girl in return for a gift of imitation emeralds.

THE STRANGER

How well you play!

LARKCOM

(He swings round on his stool.) Hullo! — you there, old cockerlor — (He encounters THE STRANGER'S eyes. Somehow they put him out of countenance.) Think so?

THE STRANGER

You have the touch of one who loves music.

LARKCOM

Here. (He rises, grins up into THE STRANGER'S face.) What's the little game? Want to borrow money?

THE STRANGER

You see, it would be of no use. You see through me at once.

LARKCOM

(THE STRANGER is smiling. He turns away, ashamed of himself.) Only my bit of fun. (By way of explanation.) My weak spot — anybody telling me I know anything about music. Here, of course — (With disgust.) Ah! All they understand here is "Tumpty, tumpty, tum."

THE STRANGER

And so you give them — what they understand.

LARKCOM

Oh well! somebody's got to do something to liven things up a bit.

THE STRANGER

Ah! yes. (He puts a hand on the lad's shoulder.) Some kind, good-natured body.

LARKCOM

Oh well! it comes easy — and I like doing it.

THE STRANGER

Yes.

LARKCOM

(There is something about THE STRANGER that invites confidence.) My idea was to have been an entertainer.

THE STRANGER

It was a good idea. You would have succeeded, I am sure.

LARKCOM

You see, I've got a voice.

THE STRANGER

And you have humour and a sense of fun, one reads it in your eyes.

LARKCOM

(Suspicious for an instant — till he looks into THE STRANGER'S eyes.) That's right. Why, sometimes — when I like to take the trouble — I'll have 'em all round me here laughing. Not an easy crowd to start, mind you.

THE STRANGER

It is your vocation. It would be wrong of you to waste your gifts.

LARKCOM

Question is, would it pay?

THE STRANGER

I think it would. And then, that is not the only question, is it? You would be giving pleasure to so many.

LARKCOM

“Giving.” Here, don't you run away with the notion that Harry Larkcom is a philanthropist. What's it going to put into little Harry's money-box? (He slaps his pocket.) That's the question little Harry always asks himself.

THE STRANGER

Always? Are you sure?

LARKCOM

Am I —

THE STRANGER

You play them "Tumpty, tumpty, tum." Why?

LARKCOM

Why! Because —

THE STRANGER

Does it give you any pleasure — you, a musician! Does it add anything to the "money-box"? (The lad stares.) No. You do it because you are just a good fellow. You will have them all around you, laughing. Wherever you are, life shall be a little brighter; dull, tired faces shall be made to smile. You give them — so much more than money. You give them — yourself. Don't you call that being a philanthropist?

LARKCOM

Of course, you can put it that way.

THE STRANGER

What other way?

LARKCOM

I do like seeing people jolly round about me; hearing them whisper to one another that Harry Larkcom's the life and — Gar on! Who are you getting at? — you and your philanthropists! I just like their admiration and applause. That's all I do it for.

THE STRANGER

Their gratitude, their appreciation. Are you not entitled to it?

LARKCOM

You are determined —

THE STRANGER

The thanks of those you serve: that is the true "pay" of the artist.

LARKCOM

Here. Am I an artist now?

THE STRANGER

And the artist is always a philanthropist, serving his fellow-men, not only for the sake of the money-box.

LARKCOM

I wonder. My old mother always would put it that way. "Harry's never so happy," she would say, "as when he's making other people happy."

THE STRANGER

Ah! She knew you. She would have been so proud of you.

LARKCOM

Well, it would be better than the sort of jobs I'm doing now.

THE STRANGER

You will forgive me. I have seen it so often. You artists are never content doing any other work than your own. All the rest is waste of time.

LARKCOM

Would you mind one day my trying over one or two little things of my own on you?

THE STRANGER

I should be delighted.

LARKCOM

Honour bright?

THE STRANGER

Honour bright! It will be pleasant — looking back — to think that I perhaps was of help to you in the beginning.

LARKCOM

Don't say anything about it to any of the others. (THE STRANGER signifies understanding.) "Harry Lark-com — artist!"

THE STRANGER

(Smiling.) And philanthropist.

LARKCOM

And philanthropist. (Laughs.) Good night, in case I don't see you again — (holds out his hand) — partner.

THE STRANGER

Good night, partner.

As a result of this conversation Harry Larkcom becomes a professional entertainer with "Fun without Vulgarity" for his motto.

Again THE STRANGER has a talk with a rich, broken-down, smutty, shady old book-maker, who is trying to get a beautiful girl who loathes his very touch to marry him as a means of supporting her indigent and quarrelsome parents. THE STRANGER had met the girl's eyes as she was starting out for a walk with the old gambler; and as a result of THE STRANGER's look she had decided not to go with him. The conversation between Wright, the old gambler, and THE STRANGER, starts with the former's remonstrance against this silent interference.

WRIGHT

I want to ask you a question. (He looks around, draws THE STRANGER further aside.) "Heat of the room" be damned. It was the moment she caught sight of you that she changed — suddenly discovered that she wasn't feeling well — (with a sneering laugh). What's the understanding between you two?

THE STRANGER

You think it was I who influenced her?

WRIGHT

I don't think anything about it. I was watching. Her eyes were fixed on yours all the time.

THE STRANGER

May it not have been merely her Better Self pleading to her?

WRIGHT

Her Better Self! What better can she do for herself than marry me? I'm rich. Ain't I going to be kind to her? Ain't I going to settle money on her — money on herself, to spend as she likes? (With increasing vehemence.) Ain't I good enough for her?

THE STRANGER

And she? Would she have been good enough for you?

WRIGHT

(Puzzled.) She! Good enough for me!

THE STRANGER

Taking all your gifts — your love. Giving you nothing in return but the cold embraces of a shameless woman.

(A silence.)

WRIGHT

You don't understand. The world ain't a story-book — all Jacks and Jills and love in a cottage. The girl's got to live.

THE STRANGER

Ay! To live! It is a fine thing to live! (He turns again smiling to little Old Joey.) You shall give her Life!

WRIGHT

(Staring.) Give her Life?

THE STRANGER

The lad she loves. (Old Joey darts a glance at Christopher, where he sits all unconscious.) She shall cleave to him, cherish him. She shall be the mother of children — children who shall crown her brows with honour! Love! Labour! That is Life to a woman. You shall give her Life!

(Again a silence.)

WRIGHT

(Peevishly.) All jolly fine. What about me? Where do I come in?

THE STRANGER

Man, you love her?

WRIGHT

Yes, I know I do.

THE STRANGER

Then it is all quite simple. There is nothing else to think of but what is best — for her.

WRIGHT

Yes, there is. There's me. Ain't I got any rights?

THE STRANGER

Ah, yes. The right to serve.

WRIGHT

Here, you're making a mistake. You're talking to me as if I were some high and mighty Knight Errant sort of a chap. It's silly of you. I ain't even a gentleman. I'm only a common little old man. Why, I was a book-maker — that's all I was. You know, a betting man — a bit shady at that. Daresay it's all right what you say. Only (he taps his breast; his voice has risen to a plaintive whine; Self-pity has given to it pathos) — I ain't got it in me.

THE STRANGER

Are you sure it is I who am making the mistake?

WRIGHT

(He makes a gesture of the hands, and, shaking his head, creeps to the easy-chair. Sits crouching with his hands stretched out to the fire.)

THE STRANGER

You are so sure, (smiling) "Sir Joseph!"

WRIGHT

(He turns.) How did you know that used to be my nickname?

THE STRANGER

You were a public character. Wherever you went, men spoke of you — of your fine lordly ways, of your wondrous kindness. Women also.

WRIGHT

Flinging your money about a bit when you've got plenty of it, that ain't the same as giving up the woman you love.

THE STRANGER

Forgetting Self — forgetting all things but the loving of her, and the serving of her! Ah yes, he would be a great gentleman who could do that. You — you do not feel yourself quite equal to it?

WRIGHT

(He turns a poor, troubled face towards THE STRANGER.)
Why mightn't she come to love me — in time? I would be good to her — and kind — and — (The quiet eyes are fixed on him. The foolish words die away.)

THE STRANGER

I think you could win her love more readily. So that she would think of you till the end always with deep wonder — teach your name to her children that they, too, might learn to love and honour it.

As the result of this conversation Wright gives up the girl, and helps on her marriage with his young rival.

The third and last of these transforming interviews that I will cite is with Jape Samuels, a tricky Jew who is trying to sell the stock of a non-existent silver mine.

SAMUELS

Don't want to make your fortune, do you?

THE STRANGER

Do not all men?

SAMUELS

Got thomething here thath going to make mine. I'm going to be a millionaire. Got a thilver mine here — (he strikes the papers with his hands) — worth — I'm that exthited about it, I go about telling everybody I meet. (Laughs.) Of courth they don't believe me.

THE STRANGER

Why should they not?

SAMUELS

Well, it ain't thenth, ith it? If a fellow hath got hold of a good thing, he keepth it to himthelf — doethn't want to let a lot of other people into it.

THE STRANGER

It depends upon the "fellow." There are generous fellows who like to share their fortune with their friends.

SAMUELS

(He looks at THE STRANGER; grows bolder.) Jutht exthactly what I thay. Why not share with your palth? Ethpethally when — ath in thith cath — thereth enough for all. (All the time he is eying THE STRANGER, advancing from point to point.) Would you like a thmall parthel? (He opens his papers, pushes them across the table, towards THE STRANGER.) You'd do good with the money. I can thee that. For a mere couple of hundred — Here, don't lithen to me. Look at the figurth for yourthelf. They'll thow you. (He seats himself the other side of the table.)

THE STRANGER

(With a gentle movement he pushes them back across the table.) You are — is it not so? — a Jew?

SAMUELS

(He starts back as though struck. With snarling anger.) Vell, what if I am? You can't help what you wath born. Ath a matter of fact, I ain't a Jew — not now. And if I wath, what differenth would that make?

THE STRANGER

Your word would be sufficient.

(SAMUELS stares.)

THE STRANGER

The word of a Jew.

(A silence.)

SAMUELS

What makth you thay that?

THE STRANGER

So many of the noblest men I have known, men I have loved, (a faraway thought is in his eyes) have been Jews. It is a great race — a race rich in honourable names.

SAMUELS

(He is hard at work thinking.) Yet to hear the way they talk and thneer, you'd think there wath thome-thing dithgrathful in even having been born a Jew.

THE STRANGER

The Jew shall teach them their mistake.

SAMUELS

(He glances up — fidgets in his chair.) Of courthe, I don't thay that thome among uth mayn't be a bit tricky.

THE STRANGER

There are to be found everywhere those who are not ashamed to bring dishonour on their people.

SAMUELS

In these conversations we see souls in the very process of salvation: putting off the vulgarity and vanity and trickery they had mistaken for themselves, and putting on their better selves, which THE STRANGER discovers and reveals to them. As Mr. Samuels says to THE STRANGER in the Epilogue, "You have always taken it for granted, sir, in all our conversations, that I was a fine fellow, in sympathy with fine ideals. But that is not what surprises me: it is to find — that you are right." In the same way Wright, the old gambler, finds his real self in ordering portraits of both himself and his landlady, at much more than the artist's price, of the artist lover of the young woman whom he himself gives up: thus helping the lovers to get married. That, not the smutty, flashy gambler, proves to be the real man.

So Larkcom with his new motto, "Fun without Vulgarity," taking pleasure in giving pleasure irrespective of what is in the house, proves to be the true Harry Larkcom: instead of little Harry of the money-box.

The method of THE STRANGER in the play was a favorite method of Jesus. In the unstable Peter he discovers and proclaims the rock on which to build his church. In Zacchæus, the hated publican, he discovers and reveals the scrupulously just son of Abraham. In the surprised woman of Samaria he discovers and reveals a herald of the Messiah, a disciple of the religion of the Spirit.

This is the method to-day of those who are dealing at close quarters with sin and sinners.

In his "Beside the Bowery" Dr. John Hopkins Denison gives a striking instance of it in Mrs. Eliza Rockwell, "The Lady of Good Cheer," as he calls her. She had come to call on the long-suffering, much-abused daughters of a brutal, drunken father; who not only abused them himself but in his crazed drunken condition had threatened to bring home a crowd of his drunken companions to carouse all night, leaving the girls at the mercy of a roomful of intoxicated men.

The Lady of Good Cheer had brought some food for the girls, including a birthday cake in honour of the birthday of one of the girls.

"They were in the midst of a jolly little birthday party, when they heard a heavy stumbling step on the stair. "He's coming!" cried the girls. For the Lady of Good Cheer the situation was a dangerous one. No one had come to her aid. To face alone a man who was so mad with drink that he had tried to kill his own children is hardly a pleasant task, and this man was a desperate character, who in his present mood would not hesitate a moment to strike a woman or knock her down. Yet retreat never entered her mind. If her heart beat more rapidly as she waited to see what sort of a creature it was with which she had to deal, no one could have detected it.

In a moment the door was thrown violently open, and a huge man entered with the lurching, swinging stride of a sailor. He had been fighting, his coat was torn, a heavy blow on the cheek bone had caused a swelling that made his eyes seem narrower and more piglike than ever, and his drooping, sandy moustache had a stain of blood upon it. He was from the North of Ireland, and his origin was evident in his speech, thickened though it was by drink.

"Gi' me s' money, Jessie," he shouted, "gotter have s' money!"

"I haven't got none," said Jessie sullenly.

"Yes, ye have, too! don't give me no back talk! I know yer tricks!" and he advanced upon her with doubled fist.

The Lady of Good Cheer rose and stepped forward with a swift movement that brought her between the enraged man and his daughter.

"Good evening, Mr. Sanderson," she said.

He had been so absorbed in his quest for the money that he had paid no attention to her. Now he turned upon her with surprise and wrath. The veins on his forehead thickened. With that sullen scowl on his face he was as ugly a beast as ever assumed a human shape, and many a strong man would have thought twice before pursuing the conversation.

"What're ye doin' here?" he shouted. "Teachin' my girls to disobey their father. I'll teach you to butt in."

He gave a quick lurch toward her. His movements had the uncertain and violent suddenness of a man maddened by alcohol. In another moment he would have struck her down, as he had just knocked down two men who barred his way in the saloon. She faced him, tall and slender, with head erect. Her aquiline nostrils quivered a little, and her firm lips tightened slightly, but from beneath her high brow her deep, steady eyes, unflinching and calm, looked him full in the face.

"Mr. Sanderson," she said quietly, "I know you are a gentleman, and that you would never do anything discourteous to a lady."

With those eyes upon him, the drunken brute faltered. His hands sunk to his side. A foolish smile, half of embarrassment, half of conceit, came over his face. "A gentleman? Yes, sure I'm a gentleman!" he said. He gave his shoulders a sudden hunch, as if his coat were too tight for them, and expanded his chest in imitation of the person of quality he was supposed to resemble.

Then he let out a cracked and maudlin laugh, that sounded like the crow of a hoarse rooster.

The girls looked on, amazed that he had not struck down their visitor. He could hardly account for it himself. When he rushed at any one with his huge fist poised, he was accustomed to see either fear or rage in his victim's eyes, and then it was easy to strike. But in these eyes there was no trace of fear nor rage, nor yet that more maddening expression of disgust and contempt. They were challenging him on a point of honour, as if they refused to accept him at his face value. They seemed to question and probe, but not to laugh at him. There was almost a reverence in them. He felt that she had found in him something that deserved respect, and it pleased him. He paid little attention to her words, but the sympathy in her voice arrested him. She was not fault-finding, as other women were. Vague images out of the past rose before his bleared eyes: the image of a white-haired woman by the fireside, whose hands were stretched out to bless him, the vision of a fair-faced bride who long ago had trusted him and believed him true. The Lady of Good Cheer talked on of his home, and of little Nellie, and of her disappointment that her birthday had been forgotten.

"Poor little Nellie!" said Sanderson, maudlin tears coming into his eyes. "Shure, 'tis a shame! It's a bad day she's had for sure! Never mind, dearie, your dad'll give you a fine present some day! But I'm too poor now. I'm out o' work. What can a man do? Dear! Dear! it's terrible!" and he gave a long sigh.

"You see we have a birthday cake, anyway," said the Lady of Good Cheer. "Isn't that nice? Sit down and join the party."

"No," said Sanderson, "I must go." A sudden fierceness came into his face, and he turned to Jessie. "Now give me that money! I've got to have it! I won't stand no foolin'!"

He lifted his huge fist again. For the moment he was out of the range of the glance by which the Lady of Good Cheer had held him.

"Mr. Sanderson!" she called.

Her voice, though quiet, was so firm and authoritative that Sanderson turned, expecting a tirade and preparing to face it with a burst of rage. But instead of a scolding he met a glance of grateful confidence that seemed to thank him for his quick understanding and prompt response. She seemed so sure that no further word could be necessary, that he gave a gasp of astonishment. Before he could speak she was inquiring in a tone of great sympathy how he had come to lose his position as pressman, and to meet with such hard luck. There is nothing a drunken man loves more than to dilate on his misfortunes, and Sanderson, willing to be beguiled, sank down on the sofa.

He sprawled with his huge length over the sofa, and she began to speak seriously and sympathetically of the life he had been living. She told him plainly what she thought of his behaviour, and he sat quietly and listened, although he would have knocked a man down for saying half as much. For he felt that, though she rebuked him, it was because she had found something in him she respected and trusted, and he recognized that she had a right to speak as she did. It was the same right which he had acknowledged in those who years ago had believed in him — the claim which faith and love always have over a man's life. The battle was won long before help came, and the girls were safe that night from terrors worse than death. On her way uptown the Lady of Good Cheer ended her account of the evening by saying: "I don't care what you say! I like Mr. Sanderson. There's something that's really worth while at the bottom of that man."

Rev. Frank H. Decker of Church House, Providence, is past master of the same method of the Master. He had sent a new applicant for hospitality out with a trusty resident of Church House to bring a bundle of clothing which a friend had offered to give to the House. On the way back with the clothing the new man said to his trusty companion, "Let's pawn these clothes, and clear out." The trusty reported the remark to Mr. Decker, and Mr. Decker sent for him and said: "I hear that you proposed to pawn the clothing you were sent to bring, and clear out." "No," said the man, "I didn't say, 'Let's pawn them.' I said 'Some fellows if they had these clothes would pawn them.'"

To which Mr. Decker, intent on finding the best rather than the worst in the man, replied, "There is something splendid about that lie of yours. It shows that you care for my good opinion. Now I will show you how to get it." How many of us would have had enough of the Christ Spirit to see the good concealed behind the lie; instead of merely the evil on the surface of the proposal to steal?

Another applicant for Church House hospitality was sent to carry home some chairs that had been reseatd at the House. At the end of the first block he put down the chairs on the sidewalk and said to the trusty companion, "I ain't going to lug these chairs. Why should I?" and went off. Later at meal-time he reappeared.

Mr. Decker in calling his attention to the affair, instead of blaming the man apologized to him for his own conduct, saying, "I began too far along with you. I assumed that you could appreciate kindness. I see you can't. Perhaps people never have been kind to you. Now make yourself at home here in Church House, and let us show you what kindness is."

That man became one of the most devoted members of the House; willing to do the roughest, most disagreeable work, of which there is a great deal, to help the House and its head.

With these scenes from the play, and these modern instances of the application of this Christ method of appealing to the good man within the bad man, we may now see how the principle applies to preaching.

Preaching is the art of keeping constant and urgent before men Christ's expectation that in every relation of life they are to do and be what absolute Good Will requires. As examples of this Christian expectation I have taken for this first lecture benevolence, temperance, and preparedness for peace and war.

First; benevolence. The man who looks out for himself and his family and friends exclusively, so far as real seriousness goes, giving to causes and appeals such loose change or small checks as will silence importunity and maintain respectability, can hardly be called in this matter a Christian. He is doing what it is perfectly easy and natural to do. There is nothing large and generous about him; nothing supernatural; nothing specially Christlike. Even if now and then in response to stirring appeals, or devices that subject his contributions to the limelight of publicity, he gives large sums; large even in proportion to his income; he does not thereby become much enlarged; he does not rise to the stature or fulfil the expectation of Christ.

Christ and the Christian preacher expect every disciple to devote all he has to the service of Good Will. He expects him to put every dollar where, all things considered, in view of his talents, responsibilities, connections, and place and function in the social system, it will do the most good. He expects him to give all to God and his fellows; reserving for himself only what God and right-minded men see that he needs for maximum efficiency in his specific station. Christ expects his disciple to care for every person in need; every cause that is effectively promoting human welfare. To those which come closest to his connections and interests he expects him to give up to the point where giving more would do more harm to himself and his family than it would do good to the person or cause to which it was given.

Christ, however, is reasonable: and the Christian preacher ordinarily will not expect his people to deprive themselves of the means of efficiency in their station and work, to give to others. That would be the folly of selling our oil instead of lighting our lamps. We owe ourselves and our families a care for the conditions of health, happiness, and efficiency which we owe no one else; and we ought to be as generous with ourselves and our families as we would wish and expect another to be in our place. That reasonable provision the reasonable Christ not only allows but expects his disciples in all ordinary circumstances to make. To do so is not selfishness: it is perfectly consistent with entire Good Will; for it is what we would wish and advise another servant of Good Will to do were he in our place.

Yet even with this explanation and limitation Christ's expectation is stupendous. Even if Good Will gives back to us all that we need; it is a hard thing to give it all in the first place. To give to the church, and charity and reform, and education and missions; to individuals and families in distress; to cities in devastation, and countries under oppression, seems impossible to the natural man. He says "I can't look out for all their interests. I can't hold all human and social needs as objects of my will; I am not big enough, nor wise enough, nor generous enough. Christ says, "You can; you are big enough: I will stretch your will, expand your heart, so that every good claim will appeal to you as something to which you will go out in generous response: giving gladly when you can do so without sacrificing a more intimate and urgent claim: withholding regretfully when giving in this direction would cause more disastrous sacrifice elsewhere."

Christ expects that universal and at the same time reasonable benevolence of every disciple. That is his measure of the capacity of every human heart: he will not own as his disciple any man who is less benevolent. There are two premises in the benevolent appeal as in every syllogism: a major and a minor. The major premise of the Christian man is, "I desire all good: my entire resources are at the service of universal Good Will." The minor premise of a successful appeal must be, "This particular cause represents more good than any other cause to which I could devote this gift." The Christian man, the man who comes up to Christ's expectation, has assented to the major premise once for all. You don't have to argue that with him in each new case. The minor premise is always an open question on which in each case he must be specifically convinced. The man who is not a Christian, the man whom Christ has not expanded and transformed, lacks the first premise; so that even if you convince him of the second, you are not by any means sure that his gift will follow. It is a question of chance, emotion, publicity, vanity, whether he will say 'Yes' or 'No.' With the Christian you have merely to establish the minor premise; and the gift is sure to follow if the man is a real follower of Christ. All you have to do is to show him where the most good lies: to the most good in general he is already committed by his acceptance of Good Will as his principle of action in response to Christ's high expectation.

In the name of Christ then the preacher says to his congregation from the pulpit, and to individuals in personal appeals: "You are big and generous enough to devote all you have to the greatest good to which it can be put. I count on you for that: you wouldn't be Christians if you were any smaller or less generous. I present this specific cause: I can't judge for you how it compares with other claims; how much you ought to give. I trust you to do that justly; and whether you give much or little, anything or nothing, I shall feel sure that Christ is well pleased with you, and you are well pleased with what you have done.

The preacher who comes to his congregation with this great Christlike expectation will get more money than one who flatters, and wheedles, and brings pressure of unwelcome publicity, or resorts to secular devices: and he will be developing benevolence as one specific feature of the Gospel of Good Will.

Temperance may be preached on either of three planes. By temperance I mean self-control of all appetites and passions. You may try to scare men into it by showing pictures of the drunkard's stomach; and giving detailed descriptions of venereal disease. That is the appeal to prudence; to caution; I had almost said, to cowardice. The man who is temperate on such grounds will be a more comfortable man physically than the man who recklessly gratifies his appetites and passions. But spiritually he is not much bigger than the man of intemperate indulgence. Indeed from some points of view he looks smaller; and the contempt in which the ascetic is held by the crowd of jolly good fellows with whom he refuses to run to the same excess of riot is not without its measure of justification. From the merely physical point of view appetite and passion in process of gratification is a bigger, stronger thing than appetite and passion repressed. All who have to do with young men know that this anchor alone does not hold. We throw it out with the rest for what it is worth. We doubtless restrain a few weaklings by it. But this is not the main reliance of a wise teacher and preacher. It is not the method of Christ.

A second approach is little better. We may point to the disgrace which follows unlawful indulgence. We may appeal to a man's desire to be respectable in the eyes of respectable men and women. This is the modern equivalent of what St. Paul called "the law"; the judgment of society. Yet a man may restrain appetite and passion for these reasons, and still be a very small soul. He too is a coward; afraid of the speech of people rather than of the penalties of nature.

Jesus never condescended to that plane: and though we cast out this anchor after the other, for real holding power, if we are wise, we rely on something far stronger and higher. We appeal to a bigger and better man than the man who always asks, "What will people say about me and do to me, if I am as indulgent in these matters as I would be if I dared?" Whether in ourselves or in others we don't much respect that attitude; and we can't hope to inspire much respect for it in our parishioners.

The Christian call for temperance is an appeal to consider the consequences of drunkenness and licentiousness to the wives and daughters of the poor. We do not wish the home life of the drunkard's wife and children, for women and children dear to us. But we are large enough to care for the home life of all men, women, and children; and Christian temperance is such control as through influence and example shall tend to discourage the blasting of homes by drink; and make happy and decent homes for all. To that bigger, better self that wills the good of all whom our conduct even remotely affects, the preacher of Christian temperance will appeal.

The same is true of sex. I often ask a College class how many of them would wish for their mothers and sisters the life of the prostitute? The very thought of such a thing is horrible. How many wish it for the sisters and daughters of somebody else? The man who wishes something for his mother, sister, wife, daughter, which he does not, to the extent of his direct and indirect influence, wish for other men's mothers, sisters, wives, and daughters is not a very large and noble sort of man. "You are not so small and mean as that," the preacher says. "You are chivalrous enough by practice, precept and example to seek for all women their dignity, their happiness, their life; even though these women are too unfortunate, or too silly, or too perverse to cherish these things for themselves. Expect chivalry of men: expect a Good Will as generous and chivalrous toward woman as is the Will of Christ; and men like Wright and Harry Larkcom in the play, men strongly tempted to licentiousness, will respond to the call to be in this respect their better selves.

For self-control on that generous, chivalrous Christian ground is something all men in their inmost hearts respect and admire. Prudential self-control, whether of the physical or social type, the libertine with some show of reason may affect to despise. But even he knows and feels that the man who refuses for his own passing pleasure to wreck homes, ruin girls, and doom to misery and shame a whole class of wretched women: — even the libertine knows that this man of chivalrous self-control is a bigger, stronger, braver, better man than himself. Invite even him to be that man of chivalrous self-control, and to his great surprise, perhaps, he will admit in theory that you are right: and if the contact between you and him is intimate enough and constant enough: if you can get and keep Christ and this Christian chivalry in close enough touch with his heart, his changed conviction will bear fruit in a changed life. To keep that positive picture of Christ and Christian chivalry clear before the eyes, warm within the heart, and compelling behind the will, as what Christ and you expect of the men to whom you speak in public sermon and in private interview — that is the fine Christlike art of preaching Christian temperance.

Here in the United States we have more of such temperance than is to be found anywhere else in the world: so much that when we tell foreigners the truth about the Christian young people in our schools and colleges, our Endeavor Societies and Christian Associations, they hardly can believe us. They have not yet learned to trust the Christian expectation which takes for granted chivalry in men and chastity in women when once its rational and noble basis is made clear. Still even here in America we have hardly developed more than one or two per cent of the power latent in this Christian appeal for a temperance that is rooted and grounded in the greatness and nobleness of a Will that seeks the Good of all; the injury of none.

Good Will, likewise, rather than the letter of any ancient precept, must solve in each specific case the question of peace or war. Christ does not expect of his followers either peace or war, as such. He expects Good Will toward all. When that Good Will comes to be the spirit of all men and nations, peace will follow as surely as daylight follows sunrise. It is the Christian's privilege and duty to have that Good Will toward all, to develop it in others, and to the extent of his influence make it the policy of his nation, and through his nation to commend it in the form of international agreements, treaties, and courts of arbitration to all the nations of the earth.

Unfortunately, this Good Will is still far from being the rule of all individuals and of nations. As long as some individuals and some nations are animated by self-will, and are capable of lapsing into positive ill will, so long it may become at any time the duty of Christian men and Christian nations, as an expression of their Good Will toward all, to resist by force the aggressions of selfish men and selfish nations. Such resistance is not a violation, but an expression of Good Will. It is not good for the oppressed to be oppressed, nor for the oppressor to oppress them; and the Christian man and the Christian nation is doing a service to both parties when he uses force to resist any injustice to himself, or to his nation, or to nations with which he is identified by proximity, treaty, or other bonds of obligation. If it is the duty of a Christian nation to use force, it becomes also its duty to have a reasonable amount of force to use. A Christian country cannot live up to its obligations to itself, to other nations with which it is allied, and to humanity, unless it maintains a sufficient military force to enable it to resist aggression and injustice.

Of course the possession of a ready military power is a temptation to its misuse. The fact that a country adopts a policy of preparedness to fight increases ten-fold the obligation to maintain a Christian sentiment which will refuse to fight so long as the ends of honor and justice can be secured by other means. The danger of militarism from preparedness is real. Power of all kinds involves serious risk. It is easier to be generous without great wealth than with it; yet the generous rich man can do much more good than the generous poor man. It is easier for an emasculated man than for a man of vigorous virility to control appetite and passion; but no one in these days advocates that easy but discredited device for self-control. Precisely on the same ground, while Good Will may be easier without than with an army and navy, Good Will that maintains an army and navy, uses them strictly in the service of justice, and refrains from the injustice they give power to do, is a far greater manifestation of Good Will, and therefore a deeper and higher Christianity.

That such Good Will is not an empty dream of the cloister, but a growing reality in the minds and hearts of Christian men the world over, is illustrated by the following statement of Dr. Friedrich Wilhelm Förster, Professor of Education in Munich. I quote a German all the more willingly in this connection because so many sentiments of a contrary tenor have come from that country. In an address to the youth of Germany on the present war, Dr. Förster says:

“Hate disorganizes, love disciplines. Fill yourselves with deepest sympathy for all who suffer in war, whose hearts are crushed, whose bodies are broken, whose homes are burned. To indulge unbridled antipathies is not in harmony with that great discipline of soul by which alone we can win the day. England needs Germany, and Germany needs England. England has given us invaluable higher points of view for the treatment of labor questions and social work. She has taught our revolutionary spirits to moderate our party passions. Let us always remember this, and in that remembrance grasp again for the future the proffered hand. It is for that better England we are fighting when we do all we can to humble and tame thoroughly and for its own good that lower England that is now in power. The national principle has had a disastrous destructive effect on world civilization. A nation destroys itself, annihilates the whole sum of civilization, if these national unities do not see that a wider phase must follow — the reestablishment of true coöperation between the different races. In the union of races will the universal Christ be born in us.”

An Englishman, John Oman, in his "The War and its Issues" teaches the same lesson. "We can have no part in any gospel of hate, as if at the present time the Germans were mere fiends in human shape. We may have to recognise that they have adopted a cause for which they must suffer, but we should do so in sorrow, as a judge who must condemn, yet who would be no judge did he condemn with a light heart or in the heat of passion. Even more than towards others, we must exercise the judgment of charity towards the enemy, recognising that we are sure to hear of the evil and not the good, and allowing for the possible bias of our own hearts. And while we know it is vain to say "Peace" when there is no peace, or set up any other standard of peace except what will endure, we would not have a war pursued beyond that necessary point, and would have no share in inflicting a ruin which was merely vindictive. We will not imagine that much conquest and little conciliation can destroy Germany and save Britain. We should recognise that a peace to be abiding must be established in righteousness and a sense of mutual benefit and Good Will."

The same basis alike of just peace and righteous war is set forth by Felix Adler in his "The World Crisis and its Meaning." "We have dwelt too long upon the cosmopolitan ideal of the likeness subsisting underneath the differences that distinguish men from one another. We must insist as we never yet have done on respect for the differences themselves, on the right of men and nations to be unlike ourselves, on our obligation not only to tolerate but to welcome the differences, recognizing their fruitful interdependence and seeking to achieve their eventual harmony. This is the new conception of human brotherhood without which war and the preparations for war will not cease. There must be created throughout the world, not the belief in an individualistic cosmopolitan brotherhood such as the peace movement has hitherto advocated, but a deep sense of the worth of the different types of civilization, and the need of each to be complemented by the rest.

"Thus national humility, compatible with proper confidence in a national destiny, is the keynote of international ethics. Not the pride of any people, in its poor conceit esteeming itself the torch-bearer or the model for all the rest; but the humility of each people, the consciousness of defect, is the fundamental condition of human peace and progress. In the last analysis there must be a bond of high and pure self-interest to tie the nations together. That highest and purest self-interest is interest in the development of each nation's own national personality, as conditioned by and accomplished through its beneficent influence in multiplying the variety and beauty of the psychic types among mankind. By patient effort, by a more penetrating ethical teaching, and by the wit and wisdom to create institutions and instrumentalities suitable to foster the better traits, we may work for, if we shall not live to see, the time when the angelic song shall be fulfilled, of peace among men because they shall have learned to take towards one another the essential inward attitude of Good Will."

Christ's expectation is neither war on any provocation, nor peace at any price; but Good Will, expressed through peace where peace is justly possible; expressed through war where war is inevitable. Rightly and broadly understood Christ does not forbid participation in war, or preparedness for war. To quote again John Oman on this point: "So long as religion means a greater sense of social responsibility, no man can be governed by a mere negative ruling from any quarter."

The preacher's duty about preparedness for and participation in war is not to tell his people precisely how many officers and men, battleships and submarines, we shall have; nor even when war shall and shall not be declared. It is to make sure that the spirit in which we prepare for and declare both war and peace shall be one of Good Will toward all the nations concerned.

Good Will requires such measure of preparedness as will defend us against aggression, fulfil our obligations to our neighbors, maintain our rights in treaties, and contribute to the justice and peace of the world an influence commensurate with our numbers, our wealth, and our intelligence. Less is folly; more is crime. That the preacher of the Gospel of Good Will should proclaim; leaving to statesmen the determination of precisely what is that measure of preparedness. The Christian attitude toward war is happily expressed in the epitaph proposed for Rupert Brooke and Roland Poulter: "They went to war in the cause of peace and died without hate that love might live."

Perhaps some one will ask "What rewards are given, here or hereafter, for responding to so high an expectation, and living so great a life?" It is its own reward: and to look for extraneous recompense is to miss it altogether. Unless Christ, and the Christlike Spirit in our fellow-men, appeal to us as the life we supremely admire and desire, we can have no part or lot in it. Christ and his Good Will refuse to take second place as means to happiness here or heaven hereafter. Whoever attempts to put rewards first and Christ and his expectation second, whether for himself in practice, or for others in preaching, belittles and belies the whole Gospel of Good Will; and so, missing the Christian life, as a matter of course misses the "rewards" he is so eager to secure. (He that loveth rewards more than Christ is not worthy of him; and being unworthy of him is incapable of appropriating the blessings he confers.

Still, while it is impossible to get rewards by seeking to discount them as something separate from Christ and his Spirit of Good Will, certain benefits and blessings come with this life as by-products, which the preacher has a right to couple with his presentation of the Gospel of Good Will.

Breadth of heart, as John Galsworthy calls it, is the first and greatest. He who rises to Christ's expectation becomes thereby one in sympathy and affection with all whom his life touches, and all whom his sympathy and prayer can reach. He grows great with something of the greatness of the Father whose Good Will to all men and all nations he shares and serves.

He becomes one with Christ in an intimate and blessed fellowship of aim and endeavor, service and sacrifice; so that he is never alone or companionless: but in whatever he undertakes feels the supporting presence, the steadying purpose of the Great Master who comes across the seas and the centuries to take up his abode in the heart of every faithful follower.

He enters into a profound and tender communion with a company of men and women, larger or smaller according to the scope and range of his life, who share his purpose, and whose purpose he shares; so that each looks upon the other as an incarnation of Christ's Spirit of Good Will; and each is loved and cherished by the others on this high and holy plane.

This communion and fellowship of the Spirit of mutual Good Will toward each other and toward all is so much deeper, sweeter, stronger, richer than ties of propinquity, passion, profit or pleasure, that those who have once found it recognize it as the pearl of great price for the sake of which all other goods like wealth, honor, leisure, amusement, so far as they may conflict with it, are eagerly given in exchange.

II

FALLING SHORT OF GOOD WILL: THE MEANNESS OF SIN

"The devil takes sweet shapes when he tells lies." JOHN MASEFIELD, The Widow in the Bye Street, p. 218.

OUR text is taken from our most effective modern preacher of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, its meanness and cruelty and wantonness. If he dwells chiefly on sexual sin it is because there the apparent good offered is most alluring and intense; while the resulting evil is most cruel and heartbreaking.

This contemporary English poet, both in the rough experiences of his life, and the coarse frankness of his language, has shown himself to be like Jesus in at least one particular — his genuine friendship for publicans and sinners. Above most modern writers he has the art to turn sin inside out; and in place of the brave, gay pleasures for which it is sought, show the unspeakable misery and woe it inevitably brings to those who have to pay its bitter penalty. As Dickens showed Steerforth the seducer in the light of the grief of the Peggotty household, John Masefield shows sexual sin against the background of the betrayed woman's shame; or the misled boy's broken-hearted mother.

For a straight lesson to the libertine there is nothing better than Masefield's lines in "The Everlasting Mercy."

O young men, pray to be kept whole
From bringing down a weaker soul.
Your minute's joy so meet in doin'
May be the woman's door to ruin;
The door to wandering up and down,
A painted whore at half a crown.
The bright mind fouled, the beauty gay
All eaten out and fallen away,
By drunken days and weary tramps
From pub to pub by city lamps
Till men despise the game they started,
Till health and beauty are departed,
And in a slum the reeking hag
Mumbles a crust with toothy jag,
Or gets a river's help to end
The life too wrecked for man to mend.

A more elaborate and artistic treatment of the evil woman is found in "The Widow in the Bye Street." There the cruelty of leading an innocent boy astray is revealed in terms of the humble but happy home the wanton woman destroyed for the widowed mother.

The story is about the fall of the boy through the wiles of the evil woman: but the title is "The Widow in the Bye Street"; and the reader is made to see each move, not as the mere outward acts of the principal actors; but as it cuts into the flesh and eats into the heart of the poor widow-mother. That is where you must look to discover the real sinfulness of sin. Without this background of mother love and domestic joy, the folly of the boy, the sin of the woman, could not be seen as the cruel and utterly despicable things they are.

The story opens with a picture of this poor widow in her home struggling to buy bread for the son who was all her life's delight.

Down Bye Street, in a little Shropshire town,
There lived a widow with her only son :
She had no wealth nor title to renown,
Nor any joyous hours, never one.
She rose from ragged mattress before sun
And stitched all day until her eyes were red,
And had to stitch because her man was dead.

Sometimes she fell asleep, she stitched so hard,
Letting the linen fall upon the floor ;
And hungry cats would steal in from the yard,
And mangy chickens pecked about the door,
Craning their necks so ragged and so sore
To search the room for bread crumbs, or for mouse,
But they got nothing in the widow's house.

Mostly she made her bread by hemming shrouds
For one rich undertaker in the High Street,
Who used to pray that folks might die in crowds
And that their friends might pay to let them lie sweet;
And when one died the widow in the Bye Street
Stitched night and day to give the worm his dole.
The dead were better dressed than that poor soul.

Her little son was all her life's delight,
For in his little features she could find
A glimpse of that dead husband out of sight,
Where out of sight is never out of mind.
And so she stitched till she was nearly blind,
Or till the tallow candle end was done,
To get a living for her little son.

Her love for him being such she would not rest,
It was a want which ate her out and in,
Another hunger in her withered breast
Pressing her woman's bones against the skin.
To make him plump she starved her body thin.
And he, he ate the food, and never knew,
He laughed and played as little children do.

When there was little sickness in the place
She took what God would send, and what God sent Never brought any color to her face
Nor life into her footsteps when she went.
Going, she trembled always withered and bent,
For all went to her son, always the same,
He was first served whatever blessing came.

Sometimes she wandered out to gather sticks,
For it was bitter cold there when it snowed.
And she stole hay out of the farmer's ricks
For bands to wrap her feet in while she sewed,
And when her feet were warm and the grate glowed
She hugged her little son, her heart's desire,
With "Jimmy, ain't it snug beside the fire?"

So years went on till Jimmy was a lad
And went to work as poor lads have to do,
And then the widow's loving heart was glad
To know that all the pains she had gone through,
And all the years of putting on the screw,
Down to the sharpest turn a mortal can,
Had borne their fruit, and made her child a man.

He got a job at working on the line,
Tipping the earth down, trolley after truck,
From daylight till the evening, wet or fine,
With arms all red from wallowing in the muck,
And spitting, as the trolley tipped, for luck,
And singing "Binger" as he swung the pick,
Because the red blood ran in him so quick.

So there was bacon then at night, for supper
In Bye Street there, where he and mother stay;
And boots they had, not leaky in the upper,
And room rent ready on the settling day;
And beer for poor old mother, worn and grey,
And fire in frost; and in the widow's eyes
It seemed the Lord had made earth paradise.

And there they sat of evenings after dark Singing their songs of "Binger," he and she,
Her poor old cackle made the mongrels bark
And "You sing Binger, mother," carols he;
"By crimes, but that's a good song, that her be:"
And then they slept there in the room they shared,
And all the time fate had his end prepared.

That is the background. For the story thrown on that background I must refer you to the book itself. A loose woman,

A copper coin for any man to spend meets the boy at a country fair, leads him astray through posing as virtuous and unhappy, and appealing to his pity and his passion. He spends his money on trinkets for her:

Joy of her beauty ran in him so hot.

Old trembling mother by him was forgot.

He loses his job; is used as a tool to bring another lover back to his mistress: finally kills the other lover and is sentenced to be hung. All the sad tale is so told that the poor pleasures of the strumpet and the boy are seen and felt in terms of the heartache and anguish of the mother, "crying herself blind"; sorry for her own want and misery, but more sorry for the poor boy's shame and delusion. She tells him what true love is ; and tries to show him that this is counterfeit.

"I know a woman's portion when she loves,
It's hers to give, my darling, not to take ;
It isn't locket's, dear, nor pairs of gloves,
It isn't marriage bells nor wedding cake,
It's up and cook, although the belly ache ;
And bear the child, and up and work again,
And count a sick man's grumble worth the pain.
Will she do this, and fifty times as much ?"

J. "No. I don't ask her."

M. "No. I warrant, no.
She's one to get a young fool in her clutch,
And you're a fool to let her trap you so.
She love you? She? O Jimmy, let her go ;
I was so happy, dear, before she came,
And now I'm going to the grave in shame.
I bore you, Jimmy, in this very room.
For fifteen years I got you all you had,
You were my little son, made in my womb,
Left all to me, for God had took your dad,
You were a good son, doing all I bade,
Until this strumpet came from God knows where,
And now you lie, and I am in despair."

Before his death the boy wakes up with disgust

At finding a beloved woman light,
And all her precious beauty dirty dust,
A tinsel-varnished gilded over lust.

When the mother comes and takes a room to be near him in prison he asks her, .

“Where did you get the money for the room?
And how are you living, mother; how’ll you live?”
“It’s what I’d saved to put me in the tomb, I’ll want no tomb but what the parish give.”
“Mother, I lied to you that time, O forgive,
I brought home half my wages, half I spent,
And you went short that week to pay the rent.

“I went to see’r, I spent my money on her,
And you who bore me paid the cost in pain.
You went without to buy the clothes upon her:
A hat, a locket, and a silver chain.
O mother dear, if all might be again,
Only from last October, you and me;
O mother dear, how different it would be.

“We were so happy in the room together,
Singing at ‘Binger-Bopper,’ weren’t us, just?
And going a-hopping in the summer weather,
And all the hedges covered white with dust,
And blackberries, and that, and traveller’s trust.
I thought her wronged, and true, and sweet, and wise,
The devil takes sweet shapes when he tells lies.

“Mother, my dear, will you forgive your son?”
“God knows I do, Jim, I forgive you, dear;
You didn’t know, and couldn’t, what you done.

God pity all poor people suffering here,
And may his mercy shine upon us clear,
And may we have His Holy Word for mark,
To lead us to His Kingdom through the dark."

Then at the end — the end save for the poor mother's going crazy after his execution — comes the mother's great soliloquy and prayer: one of the profoundest spiritual passages in contemporary literature.

"Red helpless little things will come to birth,
And hear the whistles going down the line,
And grow up strong and go about the earth,
And have much happier times than yours and mine;
And some day one of them will get a sign,
And talk to folk, and put an end to sin,
And then God's blessed kingdom will begin.

"God dropped a spark down into everyone,
And if we find and fan it to a blaze
It'll spring up and glow, like — like the sun,
And light the wandering out of stony ways.
God warms his hands at man's heart when he prays,
And light of prayer is spreading heart to heart;
It'll light all where now it lights a part.

"And God who gave His mercies takes His mercies,
And God who gives beginning gives the end.
I dread my death; but it's the end of curses,
A rest for broken things too broke to mend.

O Captain Christ, our blessed Lord and Friend,
We are two wandered sinners in the mire,
Burn our dead hearts with love out of Thy fire.

“And when thy death comes, Master, let us bear it
As of Thy will, however hard to go;
Thy cross is infinite for us to share it,
Thy help is infinite for us to know;
And when the long trumpets of the Judgment blow
May our poor souls be glad and meet agen,
And rest in Thee. Say ‘Amen,’ Jim.” “Amen.”

From this widowed mother's prayer one rises with a solemn sense of the cruel cost of sin; and pity for the poor innocent sufferer whose love compels her to pay for short-lived selfish pleasure in lifelong loving pain; bearing, as she says, her share of Christ's infinite cross.

Not every preacher can be a literary artist; but we all can use the artist's work to show that pain of innocent and guilty alike is ever the ugly other side of the smooth and glossy surface of sin. To do that is to make men hate it, and lead them to repent.

With the passing of the arbitrary God, laying down rules and regulations for his own delectation; doing each particular act as a special favor or disfavor to the individual immediately concerned, sin in the old sense, as a highly imprudent defiance of such a God, is passing too. Indeed, if that be sin, the sinner on such terms appeals to us as rather admirable and heroic. There is enough of the old Adam in most red-blooded males between the ages of fifteen and forty to shake the fist of defiance in the face of such a God, and leave his rules and regulations to be observed by such "plaster saints" as regard "safety first" as the supreme spiritual grace. The Gospel of Good Will, however, gives us an altogether different view of sin; showing it not as a dash of bravado which evokes our admiration; but as a taint of meanness which we pity and condemn.

Bacteria and the animals seek their meat from God wherever they can find it: and if the body of an animal, or the body of a man, offers the most attractive and available food, they take it without scruple or hesitation; without malice and without remorse. They seek their own good; and fail to seek the good of their victims. Yet their action, evil as it is from the point of view of their victim, is not sin. In its ethical aspect sin is the choice of a lesser in preference to a greater good; and the penalty is the loss of that greater specific good which the preferred lesser good displaces. In its religious aspect sin is the choice of some little specific good in preference to the greatest good of all — fellowship in Good Will with the Father, with Christ, and with Christian men and women: and the religious penalty for sin is the loss of that fellowship. To fail at one point in religion is to fail altogether. Good Will is one and all-inclusive: and deliberately to fall short of it at one point is to fall short of it altogether. We cannot take part of it and leave part of it, as a superficial ethics permits us to do. Like an egg, religious character and relationship is either wholly good or wholly bad. It cannot be part good and part bad. A single cherished sin shuts one completely out of real fellowship with God, and Christ, and Christian men. A person, and a relation to a person, can't be split. We are either wholly for or wholly against Good Will. That is why religion is infinitely more searching and exacting than ethics. Customs, laws, public opinion can be divided, and the man who lives by these may be part good and part bad: generous and a drunkard, genial and a libertine, truthful and a brute. Good Will claims everything or nothing. The various ethical losses and the one unescapable religious loss will become clearer as we consider specific sins.

Men fall into intemperance partly through physical craving for exhilaration; partly through mental uneasiness and a desire to throw off care and anxiety; mainly through an impulse of good fellowship and conviviality

— a desire to share physical exhilaration and mental relaxation in congenial company. All these things are so far good: they are the premiums intemperance carries with it. If these things stood alone, and no losses were charged on the opposite page of the ledger, intemperance would be not sin but an unmixed good; and every man who didn't drink and gorge would be a sinner and a fool.

Over against these little goods gained, however, stand greater goods lost:— self-control, employment, reputation, health, livelihood for himself and his family. These greater goods displaced measure the folly, the iniquity, the meanness of the sin of intemperance. The preacher's problem is to appreciate these little goods for which the glutton gorges, the drunkard drinks, and the drug victim takes his "one more shot"; through such generous and fair appreciation to come into sympathetic relations with the intemperate man; and then to make him feel how insignificant they all are in comparison to the steady nerves, the strong will, the regular business, the happy family, the comfortable home he is allowing them to displace. If the intemperate man can be made to see that, he will see that intemperance is not the brave, smart, genial, generous thing it seems under the bright lights of the club or barroom; but the cowardly, stupid, weak, mean thing that it is. When he sees that and is thoroughly ashamed of himself, he is in a mood to believe you when you tell him that no man who does such a mean and cruel thing can have part or lot in God's Good Will which is working in the world to make it kind, happy and wholesome: no comradeship with Christ who came to make that Good Will plain and winsome: no fellowship with the great and goodly company of men and women who have Good Will as the spirit of their lives. Not until, on the basis of a hearty appreciation of the little good for the sake of which he drinks or overeats, or takes drugs, we have made him feel the misery and meanness of the losses he inflicts on himself and others: — not until then have we preached the whole of the sane and searching Gospel of Jesus Christ to that intemperate man.

Licentiousness has its roots in passions implanted in man for good. Nature does not allow any generation to be more than one remove from their normal intensity. Keen pleasures, physical, æsthetic and social, are attached as premiums to the fulfilment of their functions. What wonder that youth seizes eagerly and recklessly on these offered goods. Unless one enters sympathetically into the force and worth of all the good there is in sensuous pleasure, he will not be in a position to preach to young men the fearful losses that are charged up against the libertine. For the penalties are tremendous. By long, slow, sacrificial struggle, by fearful social ostracism inflicted on women who are either the authors or the victims of sexual sin, the race has built up the pure home; its most beneficent and beautiful institution. To the extent of his ability the libertine tears that laboriously reared structure down, and deprives some unfortunate woman, or a whole class of such women, of their birthright of love, loyalty, respect and protection in a pure and happy home. Whoever for a little passing pleasure can ruin human happiness; break the hearts of grieving parents; doom to desolation and probable disease innocent and guilty alike, is mean and contemptible. He is undoing civilization's most costly and beneficent work. Reared himself in a pure home; desiring it for his own sisters and daughters; he is seeking to make a mean exception in his own favor to the way he desires other men to treat them. Such conduct, however strongly urged to it by forces which Nature has found essential to the perpetuation of the race, marks a man as altogether contrary to God's Good Will; incompatible with the character of Christ; antithetic to that Spirit of Good Will which binds all pure, brave men and women together in Christian fellowship.

The preacher has not preached the Gospel to good purpose unless his community as a whole, and every individual in it, has been brought to look on licentiousness, not indeed without intelligent sympathy for the mighty forces that drive and drag men and women into it, but with such a sense of the essential meanness of any man or woman who condescends to buy personal pleasure at such a fearful price in social deterioration and human degradation, as shall make them treat it, whether in others or in themselves or in their children, as a loathsome, cruel, dastardly disgrace.

Gambling is another of the Devil's sweet-shaped lies. It comes disguised as a form of Good Will. We love excitement, uncertainty, risk: and a few dimes or dollars add these elements to what would otherwise be a dull and tame affair. When both parties can afford to lose, a little bet adds zest to the contest or game. To refuse seems churlish and timid; to make the wager seems generous and brave.

Yet there is a fallacy in this phrase "can afford to lose." Either the loss makes a difference or it doesn't. If it does, it involves an unsocial attitude. If it doesn't, then it is useless; and might as well be omitted.

The tendency and example of gambling even on a small scale, for social good-fellowship, lends encouragement to gambling on a more serious scale; involving grievous hardship to the loser, and loss of reliance for gains on productive industry to both winner and loser. The man of Good Will, if he thinks his way through to the consequences and influences that flow from gambling, will refuse to have anything to do with it. If much is evil, as all admit, the tendency and influence of even a little cannot be good.

Speculation in its unadulterated form is gambling, and begets the gambler's anti-social attitude. The direction of capital into sound and useful channels of production is honest and honorable, an expression of the capitalist's Good Will. But that involves expert knowledge, which in turn involves keen mental labor. The shrewd investor is, whether intentionally or not, a public benefactor. He puts capital at the disposal of enterprises that effectively serve real needs; and withholds capital from those that are doomed to fail. So long as the present economic order lasts the capitalist has as important a function as the laborer.

When, however, one merely "takes a flier"; bets on the strength of rumor, tip, or guesswork that something of whose management, resources, prospects, and processes he knows next to nothing will go up or down ; he is contributing nothing. If in the long run he gains (which is very unlikely), he is getting something out of society he doesn't deserve and hasn't earned. If in the long run he loses (as in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he will), he gets precisely what he deserves. Worse, however, than the money lost is the loss of reliance on regular industry ; the impatience with slow, sure earnings ; the precarious financial status of his family ; the irresponsible, unsocial, and ultimately anti-social attitude toward the world, which the habit of speculation entails. We cannot rely for strenuous social service, and costly sacrifice of time and money, on any man who is intent on getting rich quick by the rise and fall of securities to the management and study of which he brings no intimate knowledge. Just in proportion as the speculative habit grows, will industry, domestic security, and social service dwindle and decline.

Laziness is native to us all. Leisure, loafing, is delightful ; and the love of it nature has put into us abundantly as a means of self-preservation. The good-natured, care-free loafer appeals to us. As compared to the fuming, fretting busybody, who is forever on the rack of exertion, there is a good deal to be said for him ; as Stevenson has shown in his "Apology for Idlers." Yet on the other side of the account we find poverty; if the man have no inherited or otherwise gratuitous wealth; and even if he has, we find the shirking of services which his fellows and society need. With so much that needs to be done in the home, the school, the state, charity, reform, science, art, literature, the man or woman who retires at night with nothing useful accomplished is a pauper and a parasite: unworthy to be called a servant and son of Good Will; unworthy of the name of Christian; unworthy of the fellowship of earnest and arduous Christian men and women. Not until all the idlers, rich or poor, are heartily ashamed of themselves, and everybody in the community looks on the sin of idleness as disgraceful, has the Gospel been rightly preached.

Frivolity has its roots in a hereditary love of excitement. Our ancestors lived on the perilous edge of life; were compelled to be alert to protect themselves against wild beasts and hostile tribes, to find game for food, and pasture for their flocks and herds. Cards and dancing, the "movies" and the theater, the trolley and the automobile, place artificial excitement and unnecessary motion within the reach of us all. And many there be, especially of women, who go in at these open doors of opportunity for frivolous dissipation. There is good in it all. It is better to be excited than to be depressed; it is better to be on the move than to sit still and mope. But when there is so much suffering to be relieved; so much knowledge to be acquired and diffused; so much wrong to be righted; so much sympathy needed; it is a burning shame that at the end of the day, the week, the month, the season, any man or any woman should have to show as good accomplished only so many luncheons and dinners eaten; so many cards shuffled; so many miles travelled; so many plays or pictures seen; so many dances and parties attended. As incidental diversions; as dessert after the roast beef of usefulness and the salad of helpfulness, these amusements have their important place. It is a great mistake to overlook the good they each and all contain, or to condemn or prohibit specific amusements. But to give up to them the whole or any considerable proportion of one's life, is to withdraw from the ranks of the useful and serviceable; to fall short of Good Will; to lose touch with Christ; and to miss altogether the fellowship in service which binds true Christians together in the spirit of active Good Will. The Gospel has not been preached as it should be until every one within hearing has been made thoroughly and heartily ashamed of indulging for themselves or tolerating for their children a life of meaningless excitement, with its inevitable cost and counterpart of strength and steadiness undeveloped, duties undone, services shirked, and opportunities thrown away.

Unkindness saves a great deal of effort. It is easier to snap and snarl; to upbraid and find fault; to be cross and hateful; than to take the trouble to appreciate the feelings of others and control speech and conduct with a view to causing as little pain and as much pleasure as a just consideration of mutual claims permits. Wherever a sad heart can be made happy or a wrong will set right, there is an open door into Good Will: and whoever, from unimaginative laziness and hard-heartedness refuses to enter it, or turns his back upon it, shuts himself out from that kindness which is the heart of God, the soul of Christ, and the Spirit in which all true Christians live and love.

Jealousy, envy, fill a little soul full of its own importance. If it could have this premium of being puffed up, and pay no corresponding penalty, then these qualities would be virtues; petty virtues to be sure, but not the pitiful sins they are. The penalty is inevitable: a soul full of self has no room for eager interest in other things and generous devotion to other persons ; no chance to share the Good Will which ranks others at least on an equality with ourselves. So long as we are shut in with our own envy and jealousy, we are automatically and hermetically excluded from the Christian fellowship.

Censoriousness, likewise, is a cheap and easy device for securing the sense of self-exaltation. To call another man stingy, unless it be in sorrow and with a view to his reformation, implies that I am generous by contrast. To point out with glee the impurity of another gives me a false sense of the purity of my own contrasted heart. When I denounce the hypocrite, except in pity and desire for his conversion, I cannot help drawing, and hoping others will draw, the inference that I by contrast am sincere. But to pay for these specious emotional gains, I lose the sympathy I ought to feel for others, as well as the modest sense of my own shortcomings. In judging others I condemn myself as guilty of having a soul just big enough to take in the evil, but not big enough to take in the good, in other men and women. Into such a soul the great-hearted Father, the compassionate Christ, the Spirit of Good Will by no possibility can come and take up their abode.

Conceit and pride are closely akin to censoriousness. They swell out one's vanity ; and give the semblance of greatness to the soul that harbors them. But the proud heart is so hollow ; the conceited soul is so empty ; that it is a fearful price one has to pay for indulging in these expensive spiritual sedatives. Not to the proud and conceited ; but to the meek and the poor in spirit is assured the blessedness of Christian fellowship.

Cowardice is good so far as it saves one's skin ; but it becomes detestable when it costs the repudiation of one's convictions ; the failure to stand up for unpopular reforms ; the refusal to risk life for country. The shame that is heaped upon the coward is the measure of the worth of the interests he allows to go unprotected and unserved in order to save and protect himself. Obviously no coward can share Good Will with the Christ who suffered crucifixion rather than fail to bear witness to the truth the Father gave him to see and serve.

Treachery is even worse than cowardice ; for cowardice is merely saving oneself from general risks and dangers. Treachery is the betrayal of some special cause with which we are intimately identified ; the benefits and fellowship of which we have enjoyed ; and for the loyal support of which we have given some explicit or tacit pledge. To betray such a cause, or the person who represents it, as Judas did Jesus for thirty pieces of silver, is almost the lowest depth of meanness into which sin can bring a man. To be sure even here some good is sought and gained: the thirty silver pieces have their normal purchasing power even in the hands of the traitor: but all that they can buy is so insignificant in comparison with the honor lost by treachery, that their value in comparison is negligible; and treachery stands out as almost wholly and inexcusably mean. No traitor can have a place in the Kingdom of which the Father's Good Will is the rule; Christ's sacrifice the supreme inspiration; and the spirit of loyalty and mutual devotion the very breath of life.

The good the traitor seeks; his office, or position, or bribe money, however insignificant and contemptible, is at least substantial. The hypocrite gets nothing but the favorable opinion of those whom he deceives; and even that favorable opinion is given not to what he is, but to what he pretends to be. The hypocrite parts company with all reality.

Hypocrites are of two kinds: those who pretend to be better than they are; who were the more common in New Testament times; and those who pretend to be worse than they are; who are the more common, especially among young people, at the present day. Whatever the form, the essence of hypocrisy is the same — an entire absence of genuineness — the posing as something one is not. Obviously Good Will, as it lives in the Father, as it flashes out in Christ's scorn of the Scribes and Pharisees, as it dwells in the hearts of all genuine Christian men and women, is infinitely removed from the posing of the hypocrite. Meanness, smallness, the selling of the birthright for a mess of pottage, — which is the essence of all sin, — can go no farther down than this; that one ceases really to be himself and becomes merely an impression — false at that — imposed on the minds of others.

Lying, too, has the double aspect common to all sin. In its meaner forms it is a device for shirking responsibility, escaping criticism, defrauding customer or creditor, and springs from the innocent instinct of social self-preservation. In its higher forms, as used by cultivated people, it is a generous desire to be more entertaining than a plain statement of the case will warrant; to deck out a situation in colors contributed by the narrator's "happy artistry." Many of the most charming women in the world, some of the world's most famous men, especially those of the military and sportsman types, are half-unconsciously addicted to lying as the most natural way of making themselves and their experiences interesting.

On the other hand, lying of all kinds tends to break down confidence between man and man; and, by crying "wolf" when there is no wolf, to invite disaster when the real wolf appears. The liar refuses to dwell in the same world of mutual understanding with his fellows; he shuts them out of his little life, and in so doing shuts himself out of theirs. People learn to distrust him, and in distrusting him to distrust human nature. Lying is intellectual highway robbery; and its penalty is mental solitary confinement.

Stealing has the same two aspects that are the common marks of sin. A man wants something which belongs to another. He wants it very badly. He is poor, and the man who has it is so rich that he would never miss it. Or the chance to steal is so general and indirect that the man from whom he steals will not even know that anything has been taken from him. This is the case in the more prevalent forms of stealing to-day; the stealing that is carried on by respectable citizens and honored church members in every branch of industry, commerce, and politics. I want to support my family a little better, or give my son a more expensive education, or maintain my daughter in a wealthy social circle. I cannot do these things if I confine myself to producing goods or rendering services which I offer to the world at their current market value. But I can do these things very easily if I organize a corporation and take, as unfortunately the laws of certain states allow me to take, a large block of the stock for comparatively worthless property or insignificant services. I can do these things if, as director of a railroad, I use my power as the representative of the stockholders and the trustee of the public to get portions of the road built by a construction company in which I have an interest; and then, as a member of the construction company, sell to the railroad in which I am a director the constructed road at several thousand dollars a mile more than its construction cost. I can do these things for my wife and children if, holding a majority of stock in a corporation, I sell it to parties who will use the controlling interest thus acquired, to make the stock of the minority stockholders comparatively worthless. I can do these things if, as owner of a controlling interest, I use the power it gives me to vote exorbitant salaries to myself and my friends, or to withhold dividends and pile up a surplus until the poorer stockholders are compelled to sell for less than it would be worth if the business were fairly managed.

I can do these things if I buy things which I am unable to pay for; if I use my political influence and position to secure franchises, favors, exemptions, which will allow me to make profit out of the public loss. These and countless similar forms of stealing all have at their core the innocent and laudable desire to make money, gain power, secure position for myself, my family, and my friends. All that is praiseworthy. The presence of this ambition is an indication of many personal, domestic, and social virtues. We cannot withhold a certain admiration and affection from thieves of this type, whom we meet in business, in society, at the club, and even at church.

On the other hand, when we realize how ruthlessly they strip the hard-working man of the savings of a lifetime; how they impoverish the widow and orphan; how every honest workingman in the community has to work harder and live poorer to make up for his share of the general loss that corresponds to their dishonest gains, we despise the methods by which these men have gained their wealth.

Murder is a widely prevalent form of sin to-day. In saying this, I do not refer to the rapidly increasing number of cases of violence and bloodshed. Alarming as that is, it is but an insignificant fraction of the total murder that goes on in our modern Christian civilization. As Professor Ross has pointed out in his "Sin and Society," the modern assassin "wears immaculate linen, carries a silk hat and a lighted cigar, sins with a calm countenance and a serene soul, leagues or months from the evil he causes. Upon his gentlemanly presence the eventual blood and tears do not intrude themselves. This is why good, kindly men let the wheels of commerce and of industry redden and redden, rather than pare or lose their dividends. This is why our railroads yearly injure one employee in twenty-six, and we look in vain for that promised 'day of the Lord' that 'will make a man more precious than fine gold.' Our iniquity is wireless, and we know not whose withers are wrung by it. The purveyor of spurious life-preservers need not be a Cain. The owner of rotten tenement houses, whose 'pull' enables him to ignore the orders of the health department, foredooms babies, it is true, but for all that he is no Herod. The mob lynches the red-handed slayer, when it ought to keep a gallows Haman-high for the venal mine-inspector, the seller of infected milk, the maintainer of a fire-trap theatre."

The murderers we meet in every walk of life to-day, members of every club or church we join, present in evening dress at almost every dinner or party, like the thieves previously considered, are simply the men who want big dividends with which to maintain their families in luxury, and do not inquire too curiously how many human lives they needlessly shorten to increase those dividends, or how many human heads they cut off with their coupons.

Statistics of a year's accidents to workingmen in Allegheny County, in which Pittsburg is located, published in the Nation of March 18, 1909, show that 526 men were killed in that county by industrial accidents in the twelve months from July 1, 1906, to June 30, 1907. In addition 2000 were seriously injured, of whom 500 were so crippled as to be discharged from the hospitals permanent wrecks. While the speed and pressure of the work render a large number of these accidents unavoidable, in a group of cases investigated 35 per cent were attributable to the employers' negligence; in other words, the employers preferred to commit that amount of murder rather than pay the slight cost of life-saving precautions and devices.

In Bangor, Maine, a family moved into a tenement which had previously been occupied by a patient sick with tuberculosis. The landlord neither informed the incoming tenant of the fact, nor had the house disinfected. The child of the family died of tuberculosis in consequence. When asked why he did not have the house disinfected, the landlord excused himself on the ground that he could not afford the ten dollars, more or less, which it would cost. Murder for ten dollars is a depth of depravity to which most bandits would scorn to condescend.

The rookery landlord and the jerry-builder, the adulterator and the maker and vendor of deleterious patent medicines, the quack doctor and charlatan "healer," the purveyor of polluted water and infected milk, the man who fails to fence dangerous machinery and provide safety couplers for his cars, the owners of unsanitary tenements and fire-trap theatres, the men who overwork children, and employ women on conditions fatal to either health or character, — these murderers, numbered by hundreds, and whose victims are counted by tens of thousands, are the ones who do the wholesale human slaughter of to-day. There are a hundred times as many men guilty of murder through commercial complicity in the United States to-day as there were five hundred years ago, when the bow and arrow and the tomahawk were the weapons employed. In so far as preventable disease and calamity exist in our communities, we all are sharers in responsibility for the murders their permitted continuance entails.

What shall we do about it? What has Good Will to say? We must call it by its plain hard name of murder every chance we get. We must make the men who are guilty feel themselves to be the murderers they are. We must make their practices so odious, that every decent man will be ashamed to have a hand in them.

The great demand of the hour is ethical insight; to point out in precise terms the meanness and cruelty and misery-producing power of specific sins. If the promoter of dishonest business schemes could see the privation in country homes, where the hard earnings of years of toil are swept away by the floods of water with which he has diluted the stock they purchased in good faith; if the licentious man could see the years of agony and degradation, released at last by squalid and ignominious death, which the victims of his passing pleasure must drag out in consequence of what he and men like him have made of them; if the inconsiderate husband, the merciless employer, the glib scandalmonger, the corrupt legislator, the reckless speculator, could be made to see just what their conduct means in want and woe and lingering pain and premature death to their innocent and helpless victims, they would speedily repent and mend their ways.

Sin in all its forms; the sinner in all his disguises; is foolish, mean, contemptible; utterly and irreconcilably opposed to and estranged from Good Will, Christ, and the Spirit in Christian men. To make that fact so plain that the wayfaring man cannot fail to see it, and feel it, and take it to heart, is the second task of the preacher: second only to the first task of making men see and believe in Christ's great expectation of entire Good Will. Good Will is the primary fact; for until that is seen and felt you cannot make men see and feel by contrast the meanness and disgrace of falling short of it. The best you can do is to conjure up some frightful image of punishment in the hereafter. That frightfulness in God we no longer fear; any more than we respect it in men who adopt it as a military policy. God is light and in him is no darkness at all. His Will is altogether, always, and toward everybody good. Christ revealed that goodness; Christian men and women reproduce it; and the really dreadful penalty of sin, in addition to the specific goods forfeited by it, is the unworthiness of fellowship with God, with Christ, and with Christian men which cherished sin entails. To make that fearful loss, that dreadful penalty felt as the supreme wretchedness it is; and so drive men to escape from it in penitence, confession, and conversion, is the second task of the preacher. Not the cheap and discredited terror of problematical vengeful torment in the hereafter; but the loss of fellowship with God and Christ and all who have the Spirit of Good Will — this is the weapon of the true Christian minister against the ever present hydra-headed monster sin. To wield that weapon effectively is doubtless much harder than to brandish the old red battle-axe of an arbitrary damnation; and requires of the minister more Christlike gifts of mind and heart. Already we see rising among us a ministry that shall be able to make men loath, hate and repent of sin because they see and feel the meanness and hideousness of it as contrasted with Good Will to others and to all which Christ and Christian men reveal, and which it is their supreme privilege to serve and share.

RESTORATION TO GOOD WILL: REPENTANCE AND FORGIVENESS

"I have put myself on trial in the court of conscience and a verdict has been rendered of 'guilty' — guilty of having lived for many years of my life indifferent to and ignorant of what was going on behind these walls. I want to see for myself exactly what your life is like, not as viewed from the outside looking in, but from the inside looking out. For somehow, deep down, I have the feeling that after I have really lived among you, marched in your lines, shared your food, gone to the same cells at night, and in the morning looked out at the pieces of God's sunlight through the same iron bars — that then, and not until then, can I feel the knowledge which will break down the barriers between my soul and the souls of my brothers." THOMAS MOTT OSBORNE. Within Prison Walls, pp. 16 and 18.

My text is taken from the speech to the inmates of the New York State Prison at Auburn by the chairman of the Commission on Prison Reform appointed by the Governor, who was about to serve a week's imprisonment with them. At the conclusion of the speech from which the text is taken the inmates asked about him the question that was asked about Jesus, "What manner of man is this?"

Another speech made by Mr. Osborne September 25, 1915, in reply to the critics of his administration as Warden of Sing Sing, will serve as our morning lesson. Whatever we may think about this or that method he has employed, we can't fail to detect in this speech the true Christian ring of a costly Good Will for the prisoners.

"In all earnestness I say to you that Sing Sing could stand my death, but Sing Sing could not stand my removal. I love my home and children as you do. They are far away while I am at work down there in Sing Sing. I'm doing my bit. Can you afford to let me go home? (Loud shouts of "No.") It's more important to you and to the State than to me. I can afford to go home to those I love and end my days in the spot I love. But the State cannot afford to let me go — yet.

"I don't expect to stay there long; I don't expect to live long. A man can't stand it — can't stand the responsibility of control over the destinies of so many of his fellow-men, for I'm Czar of Sing Sing. I feel the strain and I want to go home. But I won't go home until I find a man to take my place and to carry on the work

I have tried to start. I am proud of it, but the real credit belongs to the boys behind the bars, for no one can save them; they must save themselves.

"Men who are sent to Sing Sing are no longer trying to escape the reputation of having been in Sing Sing. They advertise the fact. A young man the other day advertised for a job, and in the advertisement said he had just come from Sing Sing. It's my job to find out how Sing Sing can be turned from a curse into a blessing, and I pray your help.

"Now, I have been pictured as a sentimentalist. That is not true. I am no worshipper of sentiment, but I am a devotee of common sense. I have no sympathy with crime, nor have I any sympathy with the criminal. But I have a fellow-feeling. I repeat, I have no sympathy with the criminal, and no soft-hearted man has any business dealing with crime or criminals.

"I have, as I see it, just two duties to the State. One is to keep my charges in Sing Sing, and the other is to see that they become capable and desirous of leading useful lives when they get out. Under the old system no wonder they came out brutes. Now, do you want these men, who are leaving Sing Sing at the rate of fifteen hundred a year, to go out vindictive, ready to get their revenge for the hell they have been through; or do you want them to go out feeling that the scale has been balanced; that they have paid and are square with the world and not ashamed of having paid? There is no choice. A man who feels right with the world is a better citizen than the man who wants to get even. Life and property are safer.

"You have all heard a lot about escapes from Sing Sing. I'll tell you the truth. Since December there have been three escapes. That's less than there ever was before in that time. Why, people talk about escapes from Sing Sing as if it were a new invention. They have always been escaping from Sing Sing.

"Let me correct another impression. There is no traffic in 'dope' at Sing Sing. There are plenty of ways to get it; there always were plenty of ways to get it in Sing Sing. Why don't they use it. Because they know it is best not to; they know that the Mutual Welfare League will lose its privileges if the members use drugs. It is no religious or moral motive back of it; it is selfishness. But it works. The whole system of responsibility works because it is human nature to rise to responsibility.

"I am asked, Where is the punishment? I reply, I am not a believer in mere punishment that has no end in view. Brutality never made a better man. Punishment? When you send a man to prison, when you take his liberty away, you have already inflicted the most terrible punishment you can inflict. It isn't the material discomforts that make a prison. I have suffered more physical discomforts in camp than I have in Auburn prison. Do they want to get rid of me and have a return to the old brutality? To keep a man in a cell and make him take drugs to forget — that is not only brutality, that is blasphemy. When you take away the right of speech, God's most precious gift, you make a man a brute.

"But, men and women, here is an experiment of immense importance to the whole civilized world — it is a determination of the question, Can democracy deal with the prison problem? It is not so much a problem of having men safe in prison; it is a problem of keeping them safe after they get out."

Here we have the stuff Christian forgiveness is made of — sacrifice of ease, comfort, home, and shortening of life: no sympathy with crime or the criminal as such: fellow-feeling for the man who has been a criminal: a desire and a plan for his restoration to employment and the Good Will of the Christian community: firm protection of society with no brutality in the treatment of the wrong-doer: the transformation of the prisoners from vindictive foes of society, to its disciplined and well-disposed servants.

Mr. Osborne has been persecuted and maligned as Jesus was, and every reformer has been and will be. But what is reviling, persecution and false accusation, compared to having a convict say of one, as a convict in Sing Sing said to Mr. Shuster, as reported in the Independent for July 19, 1915.

"I tell you Tom Osborne has the right idea, and he's carrying it out wonderfully. He is making the State prison what it ought to be — a place not for the suppression of all that is human in us, but a place for the making of good citizens to go back to society. Under the old system, if you weren't a criminal before you entered Sing Sing, they made one of you before you went out. Now it's just reversed. If there is anything wrong with you when you come in, they take it out of you before you leave. And they do it, not by brute force, but by fair play and common sense."

After making all necessary deduction for this convict's optimism, the mere fact that he expresses himself in this cordial way shows that he at least, if not every convict, is responding to Christian treatment with genuine appreciation and heart-felt gratitude.

To condemn sin is easy. It comes natural to the censoriousness of our hard unregenerate hearts. To condemn sin with a sympathetic appreciation of the genuine goods for the sake of which men are drawn into it, is less easy and more rare. Yet, as we have seen, this is what every preacher who would be a power for good in a community must do. A still harder task, however, awaits preacher and layman alike. Having condemned the sin; we must invite the sinner to repentance with full assurance of the forgiveness of his sins by God, by Christ, and by ourselves and our fellows, so far as we are sharers with Christ in the Father's Good Will.

Repentance begins in a man as soon as he sees, feels and confesses how large the goods lost are in comparison to the little goods his sin has gained. The prodigal son thinks first of the food in the father's house; later of the father and his forgiveness. Yet repentance is not complete and permanent until the penitent has some sense of Good Will toward him, either in his fellow-man, or Christ, or the Father, and some assurance of being taken back into a fellowship in which he is looked on not with condemnation for the sin he has committed, but with favor in view of his repudiation of it. It is only as it is thrown onto the background of Good Will that sin is felt as not merely the loss of this or that specific good and therefore folly; but as the failure to come up to the best in personal worth and relationship, and therefore needing repentance. Repentance and offered forgiveness must go hand in hand. A man can be sorry he is in a scrape, and wish he were well out of it: a man can confess that he is a fool and lament the greater goods he has lost: but he can't repent until he believes and feels Good Will welcoming him, mean and contemptible as he has been, into its noble fellowship and service.

Christianity is the good news that no sin is too heinous to be forgiven provided the one who has committed it repents. For proof it points first to Christ praying for his murderers, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." He appealed to his Father's Good Will, knowing that it could not withhold forgiveness from any penitent. He exemplified it in his own attitude. "Oh Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killeth the prophets, and stoneth them that are sent unto her: how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" What is more to the point, Christ expects his followers to be so filled with the Spirit of Good Will that until seventy times seven they will forgive repented sin and restore to favor and friendly intercourse the repentant sinner.

Hence our willingness to forgive serves a double purpose. It is the proof of God's forgiveness of our shortcomings: for Good Will in God cannot be less and lower than Good Will in ourselves. It is at the same time the best evidence of our fellowship with the Father and with Christ: for forgiveness is the hardest task Good Will has to face; and if we are equal to that until seventy times seven: if, in other words, willingness to forgive unto the uttermost is our permanent attitude, then we share Good Will in its most vital and exacting expression. It thus becomes the preacher's privilege to assure every man who has done wrong of complete forgiveness; by the Father and Christ as the witness of the Father: and also by all true Christians who share the Father's Good Will and have the Christlike Spirit. A man who would not forgive the worst wrong, even if done directly against himself, or against those dear to him, when satisfied that the wrong-doer was truly penitent, would be out of Good Will; no son of the Father; no brother of Christ; no sharer of the Christian Spirit. A Christ who did not so forgive would be no savior of the world; no witness to Good Will. A God who would not forgive at the first sign of genuine penitence would be no God of Good Will, but a Devil; meriting not the worship and praise but the scorn and contempt of Christlike men. Forgiveness of the repentant wrong-doer is so essential an attribute of God, so fundamental a quality of the Christlike Spirit, that God could not be God; Christ could not be Christ; the Christian could not be a Christian without it.

Are we Christians then? Can we rise to this high calling? In my brief pastorate I found that the hardest task I had to undertake was not to convert sinners, which is comparatively easy if you are dealing with the grosser types of sin, but to induce the Christian people of the Church to welcome into vital fellowship and cordial social recognition the reformed drunkard and the repentant woman who had gone astray. Unless the preacher succeeds in developing the forgiving spirit in his people: not the forgiving spirit in general in church on Sunday; but the forgiving spirit toward individual offenders who have directly or indirectly injured individuals; the Christian Church is only a heathen body in a Christian dress; and preaching is only a parrot-like repetition of platitudes. The vital Christian preacher toward each repented sin, then, has a double task: to assure the offender that God forgives him and to bring himself and his fellow-Christians into the forgiving spirit toward him.

The preaching of Christianity, then, with reference to drunkenness and the drunkard, should be that any man who has been guilty of this sin; and who has come to see and feel how contrary it is to Good Will; who is sincerely sorry for the cruel wrong it has done; and who puts it from him in sorrow and loathing; is as welcome a child of the Father as the temperate man who never went astray; is a brother of Jesus Christ; and entitled to as kindly and courteous a reception by Christian people as the holiest saint. Can you then greet with cordial Christian friendliness the man who has led your son into dissipation and disgrace? Suffering as you do the sorrow and shame his sin has brought to you and those dear to you, can you still forgive him when he repents? If you can, God's Good Will is in you; Christ is with you; of such as you are the Kingdom of Heaven. If you can't you have yet to learn the first rudiments of Christian living.

Can you forgive the man who has led your sister or daughter astray; filling her life with bitterness and shame, and your heart and home with sorrow and humiliation? Can you restore to your friendship a man or woman who has bought their selfish sensual pleasure at such a tremendous cost of pain and misery to you and yours, on evidence that he too shares the pain and misery he has caused, and loathes himself for having done it? If you can, you are in Good Will. If you couldn't or wouldn't, you are not a Christian, not in Good Will toward that repentant offender; but a heathen breathing out evil against one who, however evil he has been, is now repentant of evil and seeking good: and therefore is in his actual present attitude and intent a nobler man, a purer woman, than you with your hard and unforgiving heart toward him on account of his repented past.

Toward the lazy, shiftless, inefficient, incompetent employee; who is sorry for the waste and loss and injury his incompetence has caused; can you be appreciative, friendly, cordial, kindly? I don't ask, Can you take him back and retain him in your employ? Sometimes that is right, and sometimes it is not. Forgiveness does not always involve restoration to previous status. A railroad superintendent cannot rightly take back a careless switchman, however penitent; for he owes more to the thousands of passengers than to the single switchman. A theological seminary president cannot rightly retain a listless professor, however sorry he may be for his shortcomings; for it owes more to its hundreds of students, and the tens of thousands in their future congregations than it does to that one uninspiring teacher and his dependent family. But the superintendent of the railroad, the president of the Seminary can, and if a Christian must, feel a personal kindliness for the man he is compelled by official duty to discharge. Whether he retain him if he can; whether he discharge him if he must, the employer if he will himself remain son, brother, sharer in Good Will, must retain or discharge him, if he is truly sorry for his inefficiency, with something of the same sorrow and suffering which the repentant employee feels. Vicarious suffering; the innocent for the guilty; was not enacted once for all some nineteen centuries ago. It is the law of Christian living in every vital relation of life, like that of employer and employee, yesterday, to-day and forever.

Toward the frivolous young man or woman, if he or she comes to a sense of his or her wicked worthlessness, and is sorry for it and ashamed of it; we may have to be officially hard: if, for instance, we happen to be school principals or college presidents with intellectual standards to maintain: but if we are Christians, if we live in Good Will, we are bound to have kind hearts, good wishes and a forbearing spirit; and as far as our personal feelings toward them go, give them as cordial an appreciation and as sympathetic a treatment as we have for their more diligent brothers and sisters who through the whole trying eleven hours bear the burden and heat of scholastic requirement.

A man has slandered us: injured our standing with persons for whom we care: and subjected us to distrust, criticism, defeat and injury. Later, too late to undo the harm, he comes to us and says he is sorry. Can we feel toward him the kindliness one child of God should feel for another? If we are sharers with Christ and our fellow-Christians in Good Will we can. And if we can't then while we may be no worse than our slanderer was when he slandered us: we are harder, meaner, more unkind and cruel than he is now. He is now in Good Will; and we are by our own fault out of it. He is in the Heaven of God's favor; Christ's grace; the Christian fellowship. We are in the hell of hard, unforgiving hate.

A dishonest promoter, with glowing prospectus, forged testimonials, false hopes of large dividends secures the hard earnings and savings of a lifetime: lives luxuriously on the salary he votes to himself or the profits he unjustly appropriates: and when the crash comes leaves us penniless in old age. Hundreds of such tragedies are happening every day. Ordinarily the swindler of this type is too remote, too impersonal, for his victims to know personally. But suppose we do know him; and know that he is truly sorry; not merely for the prison sentence he receives, but for the privation he has caused us. We probably should not feel called upon to invest any further savings in his enterprises. But if we are Christians we should will him no more harm than the protection of society against similar swindlers requires him to suffer. And as soon as that object is accomplished, if convinced of his penitence attested by works meet for repentance, we should favor his release on parole, or even his complete pardon. Otherwise in the sight of God, measured by our participation in Good Will, we are and shall be, if not worse than he was, worse than he is and means to be.

An avaricious employer coins money out of the life-blood of our boy or girl; and by compelling him or her to overwork in unsanitary surroundings, causes disease and premature death. Just for a few more dollars he murders our dear one. For, if not ours by birth, if we are in Good Will all boys and girls are ours by the adoption of sympathy. And tens of thousands of them are being slain every year by the avarice of greedy employers and murderous conditions of employment. When he sees and confesses the murder he has committed, repents, and abandons his miserly and murderous habits of employment, can we forgive him, and count him among those whom common devotion to Good Will makes friends? If not, we are not Christians. If we can, we have learned the lesson and reproduced the meaning of the cross of Christ.

Some one has been inconsiderate, haughty, exclusive, supercilious to us, or to those we love; causing bitter pain and grief. If he repents, can we overcome our resentment, and wish for him full measure of the happiness he has cruelly refused to give to us and ours? The answer to that question will show whether in our social relations we are Christians, or mere heathen still.

Another has been jealous of our standing, our talents, our wealth, and tried his best to pull us down. Afterward, seeing the injury he has done, he is sorry, and tries to make amends. Can we give him our favor, our influence, our support as heartily as if he had always rejoiced in our good fortune? We can if we have Good Will, as Christ has it; as hosts of our fellow Christians have it.

Another has worried the life out of us by perpetual nagging, fault-finding, complaining and uncalled-for criticism. Seeing how weary and disheartened he has made us, he repents, and begins to try to see some good amid the obvious bad in us. Can we welcome him back to our friendship? That will show whether Good Will is really in us, or our profession of Christianity is an empty form.

A man has annoyed us by his intolerable conceit, until we can hardly endure the sight of him. He comes to see how silly and petty it all is, and is heartily ashamed of himself. Are we as ready with our welcome to the new man as we were with our abomination of the old? We shall be, if we are Christians; and share with Christ and all true Christians God's Good Will.

A coward betrays us; a traitor gives away a cause for which we have labored long and hard. When they see the injury they have done they feel like Judas ready to go hang themselves. Are we willing, so far as justice to our cause permits, to take them back into our friendship and favor? If Christ be in us, if we are with him in Good Will, we shall; if not, we shall not.

Finally if a hypocrite, whom we have detested as utterly hollow-hearted and unreal, confesses and renounces the loathsome sin, can we give him another chance? This is perhaps the hardest test of all: for we can't help suspecting that his repentance is only one more pose; and we don't like the idea of being fooled by him. If we do give him our confidence, our fellows will smile and call us "easy." Yet that is a risk Good

Will calls us to run whenever not mere words but works meet for repentance are in evidence. It is better that we should be deceived in an honest attempt to forgive one who was and still is a hypocrite, than that we should refuse forgiveness to one who merely has been a hypocrite; is sorry for it; and is resolved henceforth to be a sincere man.

The forgiveness of sin is not something done once for all in ancient history, or eternal in the heavens; but it is something we all are called upon to do every day, and the spirit of which we need to have with us and in us all the time. To keep that spirit alive in himself and his people; to pronounce unchristian every man and every act whereby forgiveness and its appropriate expression are withheld, is one of the preacher's hardest tasks; and one which if successfully accomplished is the clearest evidence of a successful and faithful ministry. For the man or community that has the forgiving spirit is in Good Will. While one who fails to forgive in this personal costly way is out of it altogether.

The question will arise in the minds of those familiar with traditional views, What has the Cross of Christ to do with the forgiveness of sin? If God were a jealous, arbitrary being; a stickler for his own offended dignity and the majesty of his law, we can see how the death of an innocent victim might be necessary to buy him off: just as believers in a personal devil (who by the way is not so very different from such a God) thought a ransom to him necessary. Undoubtedly in St. Paul's attempts by Rabbinical reasoning to explain Christ's death in terms of the Hebrew sacrificial system there are passages which lend themselves to such interpretation. If that is the way you think and feel about God, and Christ's sacrifice, undoubtedly you can support it by "proof texts" from the Bible. On the other hand, if you think of God as the Fatherly Good Will to all his children: most tender to those who have gone farthest astray; and most eager to welcome the prodigal's return (a view for which there are far more "proof texts"), the idea that such Good Will to men needed any ransom or appeasement of wrath is monstrous and absurd. All forgiveness, as we have seen, involves sacrifice of merely individual feelings, and power to rise above them to a point of view high and large enough to include the offender's welfare. If Jesus had not been equal to that; if he had not stood ready to pay the full measure of such devotion to the real welfare of an evil and hostile world, he would not have revealed God's Good Will: he would have fallen below what the best

Christian men and women have attained. In that deep and real sense Christ bore the burden of the world's iniquity: the chastisement of our peace was upon him: and with his stripes we are healed. He did in a typical historic situation, on a large world scale, what every one of his followers is repeatedly called upon to do:— he rose above his individual pleasure and preference to a universal devotion to the good of all whom his action could affect: and he paid with his life the cost of such devotion. If Good Will were not thus self-sacrificing, self-transcending; if Christ had not revealed it in agony and blood; if countless Christian men and women did not share this sacrificial attitude and bear their portion of this cross, sin would be unforgiven and unforgivable; the sinner who had fallen would be irrevocably doomed; and his restoration to divine and human favor would be impossible. In that sense Christ had to suffer for our salvation: but in the same way every Christian has to suffer for the forgiveness and restoration of those who wrong him and those dear to him, and in wronging them wrong the world. Christ's cross is not unique but typical: Calvary is not local but cosmic: sacrifice is not temporal but eternal. The lamb was slain from the foundation of the world. Only he who dies to self can live to God's Good Will, and restore wrong-doers to their forfeited place in that Good Will.

As the basis of forgiveness, sacrifice is necessary: not in an external, forensic, or merchandising sense; but in the intimate, personal sense of including others, however undeserving they may have been, in the Good Will which one shares toward them with God. So understood, the preacher may and should freely use the sufferings of Christ as the strongest appeal to Christians to be forgiving; and to wrong-doers to believe that God's Good Will forgives them the instant they repent.

For Christ's sacrifice is so clear and compelling: so individual and so universal: so enshrined in literature and art, emotion and conception; that it reveals the forgiving Good Will of God a thousandfold more effectively than the fragmentary, scattered sacrifices of his followers; obscured as these are by familiarity, imperfection, and entanglement with sordid details.

The preacher then will preach Christ and him crucified as the assurance of the forgiveness of sins. But it will be a cross borne in the heart of the Father as well as the Son: a cross of which each faithful and forgiving follower bears his part.

Good Will, conditioned by the structure of the universe and the freedom of man, seeks for each and all the greatest good these conditions permit. When a man does wrong, Good Will resists the wrong action in the interest of those who are wronged by it; and also in the interest of the wrong-doer. For it is good for the transgressor to find his way made hard. When he turns from it and repents, Good Will instantly accepts him as potentially its servant. To go on identifying the wrong-doer with the wrong he has repudiated would be not only brutal but stupid. It is not merely contrary to Good Will; it is contradictory to the facts. The repentant wrong-doer is right: and if God did not recognize it he would be unreasonable: if recognizing it he did not forgive he would be unrighteous. Forgiveness is not a special favor, exceptional, gratuitous. When a wrong-doer has repented it is the only decent thing to do. A man who would not forgive another man who repented the wrong he had done him would be an inhuman brute. A God who would not forgive a man who repented the wrong he had done, would be a devil. Christ has revealed the reasonableness and righteousness of forgiveness so clearly and beautifully that whoever falls below it ceases to be divine and human; and becomes brutal and fiendish.

The fact that so much of our theology presents a God who is reluctant to forgive, and forgives only by special arrangement, shows how far we are from having incorporated into it the disposition and insight of Jesus. As Jesus taught us, the fact that "we ourselves forgive every one that is indebted to us" (Luke xi. 4), is sure proof that a God who is not inferior to us cannot do less than forgive us our sins. Refusal or hesitation to do so is unmistakable evidence of the uneliminated brutality of the God or man who fails to forgive.

Forgiveness is the most distinctive note Christ brought to the world; and explains why he was so insistent on repentance. For until the wrong-doer repents it is neither rational nor righteous to forgive him. To forgive the unrepentant, or, in Mr. Osborne's words, to sympathize with the criminal as criminal, is to enter into complicity with his wrong-doing. Only on the basis of stern condemnation for the deliberate and unrepentant wrong-doer is forgiveness consistent with moral and spiritual integrity. Cherished and unrepented sin, as we saw, shuts the sinner entirely out of fellowship with Good Will. That truth must be firmly held and uncompromisingly proclaimed. Then with equal confidence the complementary truth must be added: that not by special arrangement, or forensic dickering, but as the essential expression of the intrinsic nature of Good Will, each and every sin is forgiven, the worst wrongdoer is restored to the favor of God, of Christ, and of all Christian men, the instant he sincerely repents the wrong that he has done. As sure as sin shuts out the sinner; so sure sincere penitence brings forgiveness and the welcome to the Father's house of the returning prodigal. We are all prodigals: sacrificing over and over again, until seventy times seven, the greater and the greatest to the little and the less; but as often as we repent, even unto seventy times seven, we are assured of the forgiveness and fellowship of God, of Christ, and all men who have the Christian Spirit. This is the best part of the good news the preacher of the Gospel of Good Will is commissioned to preach.

He has, however, more to do than merely to preach it. He must bring himself and his people to practice it. Forgiveness is kindness toward a person who has been doing something which we abhor. It is personal Good Will shining through intense disapproval. It is close and friendly contact with a person whose act and attitude we shrink from and antagonize. It is not natural, and therefore rare. When it occurs it is supernatural and indicates the presence in the heart of him who forgives, of something superhuman, divine. That something is Good Will in its most costly, sacrificial form.

Who is the agent of forgiveness? In the deepest sense, of course, God, and God alone, can forgive sins. That, however, is only another way of saying what was said above, that forgiveness is an act of supernatural, divine love. For God is Good Will; and whatever can be done only in Good Will, is done in God and through God.

In another sense, equally profound, Christ is the one through whom all sins are forgiven. For Christ is the historic representative, accepted as such by an ever increasing proportion of the race, of that self-sacrificing, outgoing love which holds dear and sacred every human soul, however depraved. Since Christ means that, and without that forgiveness is impossible, we rightly regard him as the Forgiver and Saviour of all who have sinned. There is no other door into the sheepfold. Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

All this, however, may be accepted either in a dry, dead, traditional sense, or in a fresh, vital, world-conquering sense. Of late the church, for the most part, has accepted it in the dry, dead, unfruitful sense. The church that takes it in this sense is doomed. The preachers that preach it are offering their diminishing congregations a gospel of mere words.

The agents of God's forgiveness are individual Christian men and women. The real church is the company of those who have God's forgiving love in their hearts, and bestow it on their fellow men. Wherever one such soul forgives and loves another, however unworthy that other be, there the kingdom of God comes and spreads. Whoever forgives others has the indispensable experience within him by which to interpret the reported and transmitted forgiveness of God in Jesus Christ. To those who lack that experience in themselves, or lack some human friend to act as its interpreter to them, forgiveness, however eloquently reported in book or sermon, remains a sealed message, an untranslated and untranslatable cipher. Forgiveness is a personal relation, and requires for its full and adequate expression two parties, both human, sharing together the condemnation of whatever has been wrong in either; bearing toward each other mutual respect, and mutual affection. Until God's forgiveness is thus incarnated, until Christ's forgiveness is thus reproduced in the specific situation where it is needed, toward the particular individual who has done the wrong, it remains something up in the clouds, back in ancient history. It is not a vital, flesh-and-blood reality, doing its redeeming, transforming work in the midst of breathing, erring, repenting men and women, in the homes, and factories, and farms, and stores, and offices, and prisons of the actual modern world.

If we are to help save the world, we must not merely report forgiveness as a fact in eternity, or as an event in past time. We must not merely symbolize Christ's sacrificial love upon the altar, or announce it from the pulpit: we must act it out; we must be the agents of it. For though it is true that one may learn of Christ's forgiveness from sermon or Bible, even then it is experience of forgiveness by a human father, mother, teacher, or friend, which gives the hearer or reader the power to interpret in real terms the reported or recorded forgiveness of Christ.

Real forgiveness, genuine salvation, requires that some one who has the love of Christ for men in his heart shall come close to the individual who has done wrong, touch him at the sensitive point of his particular wrongdoing with mingled kindness for him and condemnation for his sin, and win him to share with the one who loves him, and with God, their common condemnation of the wrong which he has done. Whoever makes such loving forgiveness the principle and spirit of his life, thereby enters and abides in the kingdom of God, and the body of Christ. Wherever one such soul forgives and loves another who has done wrong, there the kingdom of God comes, there the church of Christ extends and spreads. All who have that experience, have the experience wherewith to assure themselves that the reported forgiveness of God in Jesus Christ includes and applies to them; and to all whom, with the insight of love, they lovingly forgive.

GOOD WILL IN SECULAR VOCATIONS: SERVICE

"All business should be done so that the advantage is distributed. Business success should mean much more than the enrichment of an individual. It should mean that the community is enriched." WILLIAM H. BALDWIN, Jr., in An American Citizen by John Graham Brooks, pp. 282-283.

THESE are the words of a brilliantly successful railroad president. Our lesson will be a series of brief selections from his biography, showing the attitude towards business this successful railroad president maintained. Before describing this attitude as an ideal for all vocations it is well for us to recognize that in one man at least, in the most intricate and delicate of all vocations, that of railroading, this attitude, here in the United States in the twentieth century, has been a fact, and a successful fact.

"There was never a moment when, in the deeper, wider currents of his mind, he was not moved by impulses greater than the acquisition of wealth: never a moment when this was not a secondary and subordinate object of his energies."

"He early learned that interests between the management and the laborer are one and the same only as both sides try to make them the same. This harmony does not come of itself, nor is it to be taken for granted. All the truth it holds has to be created by honorable purpose and Good Will."

"He came to think of the railroad as having one final justification, — namely, the development of business in the communities through which it passed. It was there to make life easier to the farmer. It was there to cheapen products to the consumer. It was there to assist in the distribution of congested city populations."

"His whole idea of the railroad was to develop it in the interest of everybody along the route. Its prosperity was to be the common prosperity. Baldwin not only held that as a theory, but he acted upon it practically."

"With stubborn valor he took the position that all business necessary to be done, can be done without baseness. It can be done without low trickeries and without organizing injury against one's fellow men."

"Among his best and surest gifts was that rare power of putting himself so vividly in the place of another, as to enlarge and humanize his observation. He was always helped by asking, 'What should I think and do, if I were actually in that man's place?'"

"Our transportation system is our largest machine and also our most important. It is so important that the motive in its management should be elevated and broadened. It should be first a social motive and not a personal one. He insisted that the propaganda for teaching this social motive to the people could not begin an hour too soon."

"In the spirit of fair play, he asks the simplest question: If these billions of capital have to be organized in order to protect themselves against disrupting rivalries, do not the laborers working for these organizations have the same need of combination? Do they not need it for the same reason? Is capital exposed to cut-throat competition in any greater degree than labor is exposed to it? How can capital have the face to ask for combination, in order to free itself from a murderous competition, when labor suffers every bit as much from the same cause? An encouraged immigration of unskilled foreigners subjects the common workman in this country to the most relentless pressure, and yet he is to be deprived of the very instruments of self-protection which capital claims and is strong enough to get."

"I need, as an employer, an organization among my employees, because they know their needs better than I can know them, and they are therefore the safeguard upon which I must depend in order to prevent me from doing them an injustice."

"The function performed by railroads has become too important to the body politic to permit of any solution of these serious labor and wage questions, except by intelligent consideration on the part of the representatives both of the management and of the employees."

"Collective bargaining and voluntary arbitration are possible only when the employer recognizes the right of the employed to have a voice in the fixing of wages and conditions of employment. The recognition of committees of employees is absolutely essential and is judged to be inevitable."

"His religion of Good Will is a religion which required in his case little ritual or institutional expression. He lives it quite as much on Monday as on Sunday. He lives it in his office and on the train. He lives it in the turmoil of a strike and in the treatment of his subordinates. He lives it with the negro, for whom he asked justice as he asked it for the trade-union. It is this religion which gave him the pity and tolerance for the prostitute even while enforcing the law against her."

"His assertion that the private dividends should not be first, but strictly subordinated to the common welfare, is an unflinching ethical proposal. There is no better definition of social morality than conscious submission of our action to the good of the community. To make the common weal the controlling test of corporate action would moralize business as it would moralize politics. It would revolutionize our wealth-making more profoundly than most socialist schemes now in vogue. This principle of using corporate power first for public ends, was not with Baldwin a mood of phrase-making. It had to him a clear-cut meaning on which he was willing to act."

"Baldwin did not vapor about ideals or force them upon unwilling ears. There never was in him a taint of the 'holier-than-thou' attitude, yet he was an idealist in its strict and proper sense — a mind moved by ideas. What haunts him and even drives him is a moral imagery of something better. The propelling idea in his case is moral because it consciously includes the good of other people. If the mental picture is that of his railroad, he conceives of it in relation to public welfare. The railroad must be more and more efficient in a service that includes everybody. He does not think of it merely as a machine out of which a few private pockets are to be filled. Its one justification is that it helps toward a development in which all men share."

"It was never for a moment his purpose to make all the money he could possibly acquire. With moral deliberation, he set limits to his own acquisition. He would make money, but he would make it with conditions. He would neither be a parasite nor a gambler. Upon principle, he would grow rich more slowly if there were any question of straight and honorable methods. In a case of proposed railroad extension, he was asked, as an official, to take advantage of plans then secret and buy certain properties. He considered it, but refused. 'I could have made a pot of money out of that,' he said, 'but I should have sold too much of myself.'"

With this twentieth-century, American fact as text and lesson, we may now apply this "religion of Good Will" to other representative vocations.

To transform into expressions of itself all secular vocations is the practical aim of Good Will; and therefore the objective at which the preacher by words and the layman by works must aim. We must see in sharp, clear contrast the difference between the man who is and who is not enlisted in the service of Good Will, as that difference comes out in the secular vocations.

Stated in general terms that difference is that the selfish man does not consider, and the servant of Good Will does consider, the consequences of his action to all who are affected by it precisely as if he bore those consequences in his own person. Let us then run through a representative list of vocations, putting the natural man who serves his own will first, and the Christian man who serves Good Will second in each case. That will show what the preacher has to preach, and the layman has to practice, to make the world the Kingdom of Good Will and of Christ as its historic champion.

The natural man, as worker, thinks first of his pay; and secondly of doing his work well enough to hold his job and continue to draw his pay. The man who has heard and obeyed the call of Good Will thinks first of his work and the substantial benefits it will confer on the consumer of its product; does it heartily with his eye on the good it is doing; and takes his pay gratefully as more or less of an equivalent given him in return for the service he has rendered. The natural man therefore does his work slavishly and grudgingly: the disciple of Good Will does it freely and gladly; giving full measure, whether the measure of pay is quite full or not.

The natural man, as player of any game plays to win, by fair means or foul. The man of Good Will in every game virtually offers the prayer, "Fair play; and may the best man win." He would rather be beaten fairly than win unfairly: and when the better man wins will be as glad for him, and as appreciative of his skill and prowess, as though those superior qualities had been his own. The boy who can do his best and still be glad to find in another a better than his best, has gone a long way on the Christian road: and the preacher who can enter his young people on that arduous race is doing his part as coach of their spiritual athletics. Pluck, training, courage, perseverance, and also courtesy, honor, chivalry, magnanimity, must mark the spiritual athlete who will win the prize of Christlike character offered by Good Will.

The natural employer of labor, the employer who recognizes no will but the will of his own interest, will pay as little wages, and provide as inexpensive conditions of life and labor as possible; and let his relations to his employees end then and there. It is the preacher's duty to make every such employer chronically uncomfortable. He will make the cold-blooded, hard-hearted grinder of the faces of his employees realize that not to make his relationship to his employees an expression of Good Will, is to be himself out of that Will altogether. Bits of it he may pick up in his home, his club, his associations with other employers. But in the full comprehensive fellowship of Good Will no employer of labor can be, who fails to make the welfare of his employees the constant object of his will.

On the contrary the employer who is himself in the employ of Good Will aims to make his employees participants in the financial profit; the social spirit; the good name and good order, which binds employer and employees together in mutual loyalty and devotion. Precisely how this is to be done or how far it should be carried, through profit-sharing, arbitration, welfare work, social centers, athletic teams, the preacher may not be enough of an accountant, a business man, or a sociologist, to point out in detail. Unless he is an expert he will do best to leave these details to the employer to work out in his own way. His business is to make sure that the employer, if he thinks of himself as a Christian, shall as an essential part of that thought think of his employees as partners, brothers, helpers, friends, whose interests are included in the interest he takes in his business as a whole.

The Christian employee, in proportion to the number in his class, is rarer than the Christian employer. The natural man as employee does as little as he can: feels no responsibility for use of time, care of tools and plant, economy of materials, or soundness of product. He regards his employer as his natural enemy; and too often values his union chiefly as a means of fighting him.

The Christian employee, the employee who lives in Good Will, makes his employer's interest his own; whether this interest is reciprocated or not; even if the employer be a big and perhaps corruptly managed impersonal corporation. He will give it his best work, his best thought, his best care; whatever he gets in return. If he joins a union and fights for and by collective bargaining, as he has a perfect right to, he will be careful to do no injury beyond what may be necessary to make his employer realize his rights and treat him as a fellow-man. With malice toward none, with charity for all employers, the Christian employee will do his best work as long as he works at all; and when he strikes it will be under the stern necessity of a last resort in the interest of justice; not as a welcome chance to show his animosity.

This Gospel of Good Will, when preached to working-men and their unions, will not always be a welcome one. But the preacher must be as plain with the employee as with the employer; hold up as high and hard a service of Good Will before the one class as before the other. The Christian solution of the labor problem is not as simple, as easy, as congenial to the heart of the selfish man as many of the panaceas offered appear to be. But if once generally applied it can be guaranteed to work: and not only solve the problem, but make heroes of those who do their part in its solution.

The selfish man as merchant aims to make as much as he can out of his customers and still retain their trade against competitors. If cheap goods will bring larger profits and more frequent sales than substantial goods, cheap goods he will sell. If worthless or deleterious goods, like most patent medicines, yield the largest margin of profit, and develop a habit which it requires repeated purchasing to satisfy, those he will advertise and urge his customers to buy. The customer in every transaction is regarded, not as a man to be served to the best of the merchant's ability for a fair return; but as a profit-producer to be exploited. "Let the buyer look out for himself, it is no business of mine to look out for him," is the heartless motto. It is the preacher's duty to show that merchant that he is nothing more nor less than a legalized pirate, preying on the necessities of his fellow-men. The preacher very likely does not know enough about merchandising to tell the merchant just how much profit he should charge when virtual monopoly gives him the chance to charge what he pleases. But if he is fit to be a preacher, he does know what the spirit and attitude of a merchant toward his customer ought to be; and he will not allow that merchant to be comfortable in his own mind, or well esteemed by others, unless the goods he sells, the prices he charges, are determined not alone by the presence or absence of effective competition; but by a genuine desire to serve the customer by giving him at a price fairly representing the value of his skill, his risk, his capital, his labor, the commodity that customer desires. That is what it means to preach Good Will to a merchant. On no lower terms has the preacher the right to assure the merchant that he is filling his place and performing his function as Good Will requires.

The professional man takes as his province some line of service, Law, Medicine, Religion, which involves for its thorough comprehension a prolonged training, and a developed insight which the laity as a rule cannot attain. They consequently are entirely at his mercy; absolutely dependent on his skill, integrity and honor for the soundness and worth of what he gives them in professional service and advice. Hence the professional man must be one of two things: either a free and conscious servant of Good Will as it applies to the cases with which he professionally deals; or else a downright charlatan, palming off under the protection of his professional authority not merely worthless but positively deleterious substances or services. The temptation to be a charlatan is at times very strong. It is cheap: it is profitable: and in individual cases it appears easy to escape detection. The lawyer, physician or minister who has not felt at some time or other the temptation to substitute the cheap guess for the costly certainty, the easy evasion for the expensive solution of a hard problem, is probably rare. Good Will in the Christian professional man involves bringing to bear on each specific case the fruits of the world's best science and skill as it applies to that case: the resolute refusal to offer anything less than the best one is capable of acquiring and using. The Christian professional man is thus the representative of Good Will in some specific sphere not easily accessible to the layman: and he is bound to make the interest of patient, client or parishioner his own; yes more than his own: he is bound to place it above personal profit, convenience, reputation, or in critical cases his own health and life. As the professed representative of a single difficult phase of Good Will, he must see that that Will is done, whatever the cost to himself. The Gospel is not fully and faithfully preached until every professional man in the community is taught to measure himself by the high standard of doing disinterestedly and devotedly all that Good Will requires of the man who represents it in one of its more arduous and technical forms.

The scientist likewise is tempted to accept hearsay and tradition for first-hand truth. The former is easy, cheap and respectable: the latter is hard, expensive and often at first unpopular. Formerly this duty of truthfulness on the part of the scientist was not adequately recognized; and the easy repetition of tradition, the cheap adoption of respectable error, was thought to savor of orthodoxy. Our generation has learned the lesson that Good Will is at the same time, especially for the man who assumes to be an expert, the will to truth; though there are sections of the world, and branches of the church, where Good Will is still confounded with the will to lie; if the lie only be in the interest of ecclesiastical tradition. Against all that the preacher must set his face: he must put truth, however unpopular, however unsettling, however apparently dangerous, above orthodoxy, above safety, above immediate comfortableness. For Good Will cannot permanently be promoted by falsehood; and all the immediate good that temporarily seems to be gained by pious fraud has to be paid for when ultimately the truth comes out, as it surely will. The blame for the disillusion and doubt the truth brings attaches not to the men who bring the truth, but to the men who clung so long to error — and taught others to cling to it.

The preacher must rid himself of beliefs which he holds at second hand; and profess to believe only the things which he sees with clearness and holds in sincerity. Any make-believe in his own thinking will betray itself in a tone of unconscious insincerity when he attempts to influence others. It would be easy to name whole ecclesiastical communions whose clerical utterances on certain subjects carry to the candid no conviction whatever; simply because we feel sure that they have never dared to be frankly candid and sincere with themselves. On the contrary the preacher who is the conscious servant of Good Will, becomes so fearless in his rejection of falsehood, so single-minded toward the truth, so transparently honest in his distinction between what he is sure of, and what he is uncertain about, that all who hear him catch the holy contagion of transparent truthfulness.

Special pleading or elaborate argument in the pulpit seldom convinces anybody: but the confident assertion of a man who is transparently sincere with himself, carries weight with all who see and feel his sincerity. Historical and metaphysical matters may be doubtful: but there are plenty of moral and spiritual truths to which the sincere preacher can bear convincing testimony. The preacher who lives in Good Will will never be tempted to the impossible task of trying to convince his people of something of which he himself is doubtful. On the other hand mere truthfulness is only one special section of the total sweep of Good Will. It would be easy to name one or two denominations which have so prided themselves on their intellectual sincerity that they have lost the perspective of other phases of Good Will, like charity, modesty, sympathy. Truthfulness for the scientist is vital: and if he fails in that point, he fails totally. But for the ordinary man, truthfulness is merely one of a hundred ways in which Good Will seeks and finds expression.

The teacher's temptation is not so much to falsehood; as to indifference; to the half doing of his work; to thinking that because he has "got off" something in the presence of the learner, therefore the learner has learned: whereas the getting off of truth is only the easy end of teaching: the real test being whether the truth is brought home to the minds of the pupils, and there appropriated and sympathetically shared. To shirk this harder task is the great temptation of the teacher; one into which a teacher without conscious Good Will is pretty sure to fall.

The teacher then must be taught to see teaching as an opportunity to put truth so clearly, convincingly, pictorially, appreciatively, sympathetically that the pupils will assimilate and organize it into the structure of their minds, and embrace it with the affection of their hearts. The preacher must know and feel, and make teachers know and feel, the infinite difference between a teacher who teaches a lesson and is done with it when it is off his mind, and a teacher who lives imaginatively and sympathetically in the minds of his pupils; and prepares, presents, reviews and examines with a view to the effective assimilation and organization of truth in the minds of the pupils. Only the latter teachers enter and abide through their vocation in Good Will. Educational officials, like presidents, principals and superintendents, if they know their business, will refuse to have on their staff of teachers any men or women who are not Christians in the sense of being the sympathetic servants of their pupils.

Wealth, the product of past and the control over future labor, can either be a curse or a blessing to its possessor and to the world. Gained unscrupulously; held greedily; invested recklessly; wielded mercilessly; spent ostentatiously; given away promiscuously; it has untold power to harden, and hurt, and degrade. To do these things is natural and the line of least resistance for the capitalist. If he does these things it is the preacher's duty to denounce him as the enemy of Good Will. On the other hand gained, invested, saved, spent, given in such ways and such proportions as Good Will demands, capital becomes a mighty benefit and the capitalist a mighty benefactor.

The preacher may not be enough of an economist and financier to tell the capitalist in detail precisely how to avoid the curse and win the blessing that the possession and use of capital involves. But he must be an expert in the right attitude of the capitalist toward it. He must help his wealthy men to offer their wealth conscientiously, wisely, disinterestedly to the service of Good Will. He must help them to make sure that the proportion of their wealth they invest in productive industry will do more good so invested, than it would if invested in other forms of production; or if given, or spent on himself and his family. The rich man must be sure that the amount of money spent on himself and his family will do more good so spent than it would if invested or given. He must be sure that the money he gives tends to do more good so given than it would if given in other directions, or invested, or spent. This is a hard task ; and with or without help in detail from the preacher the rich man is pretty sure to make a great many mistakes. But it is the rich man's duty to make this effort ; and the preacher's duty to keep him aware that only through such a devotion of every cent he has to the most effective service of Good Will can he win the blessing and escape the curse of riches. It is the preacher's task to point out this very narrow way to every rich man in his congregation ; and to assure him that while to unregenerated human nature such a disinterested distribution of one's resources is impossible, it is, at least in intent and aim, not only possible but imperative for all who have Good Will. Giving is hard to the man whose will is merely the resultant of his natural desires. Why should he give "away" — away from himself — what he so laboriously has won? And if he does give, there is sure to be some self-centred motive behind it ; "to be seen of men" ; or to get rid of annoying importunity.

Good Will once made the object of the individual will identifies the giver with the person or cause he seeks to help. If being seen to give will incite others to give too, he will let the light of his giving shine : not for his own individual glory, but that Good Will may be glorified and better accomplished through other generous hearts. But if no such good is to come from publicity, the giver who gives in Good Will will prefer not to let his left hand know what his right hand doeth. He will be so intent on Good Will; so identified with its aims, that personal mention in connection with it would be unwelcome, because distracting attention from the gift and its aim to the giver and his merits — a very minor consideration in the mind of any man who has Good Will at heart.

There is hardly a better test of one's progress in Good Will than this — whether one wishes to be known in the matter other than as such knowledge strengthens Good Will in others: or whether one regards his gift, and the good it may do, as a means to his own popularity and reputation. How far short of giving from Good Will most of us fall may be seen in the difference in size between an anonymous gift to the contribution box, and the public subscription we would make to the same cause.

Shall the Christian fight? He prefers peace. He will not fight for aggression or gain. Yet rather than let tyranny oppress the weak, arrogance break down civilization, lust ravish the defenceless, greed exploit the poor, hypocrisy block the way to Heaven, the man who is animated by Good Will will fight with the army and navy, with the police and the courts; and on the uncivilized frontier with his revolver and his own right arm. Yet he will do it without malice; with sorrow that he has to; with forgiveness at the first sign of penitence; with outstretched hands of helpfulness the instant the vanquished surrender. As long as the motive of the fighting is not the enemy's harm as such; but the repression of the injustice he is seeking to commit; fighting is not merely consistent with, it becomes expressive of Good Will, which is the essence of Christianity. Incidental injury to our enemy, if it is merely incidental to doing good or repressing evil, because it is not made the prime object at which the will aims, does not vitiate the will. Whoever inflicts injury sincerely regretting the necessity of doing so, because Good Will requires it, becomes therein the true Christian soldier.

The writer who writes whatever comes into his head, regardless of its effect on the reader, is unchristian. He wields the mighty power of the pen to the wanton injury of multitudes of readers. Some incidental injury to the immature and the unprepared, if accepted as a regretted necessity, as a means to greater goods on the whole, is, like injury inflicted regretfully in war, consistent with and expressive of Good Will and therefore Christian. But harm intentionally done for fame or gain, in indifference or self-conceit, marks a writer as anti-Christian — the enemy of Good Will.

The artist in sculpture, painting or drama is subject to the same test as the writer. Harm done incidentally with reluctance as an unavoidable means to a greater desirable benefit on the whole is not only permissible but laudable. Great art, like nature, is bound to harm some who are not prepared to receive it worthily. But no artist can positively will that harm, or fail to deplore it, without coming under the condemnation of Good Will, and forfeiting the fellowship of those who share and serve it. Beauty is a large element in that good which is the end and aim of Good Will: but unless the good in the beauty of an artistic creation is clearly greater to those who behold it worthily than the harm to those who behold it unworthily, the work of art and the artist who creates and exhibits it is an enemy of Good Will. For while good and beauty to a great extent coincide, good is the more inclusive term; and therefore ultimately beauty must be weighed in terms of good. A work of art which has as its foreseen and deliberately accepted chief result the stimulation of lust, however beautiful, is an unchristian product; and excludes the artist who creates it from the fellowship of Good

Will. If this be Puritanism it is a Puritanism that is as old and noble as Plato and Aristotle and Jesus. Beauty is a precious thing; but offending beauty is condemned by all who have Good Will.

Taxpaying is a rather searching test of the extent to which one has become identified with Good Will. The man who is living in his own will as supreme will hate his taxes; dodge them; make private deals with the assessors. Between him and the public welfare which his taxes are to support and serve there is a great gulf fixed, deep and wide as the gulf between hell and heaven — indeed, profoundly apprehended it is that very gulf, — and the natural will, unless it gets across on some such shaky bridge as regard for reputation, or fear of fine and imprisonment, cannot cross it.

Good Will spans that gulf — or rather for it the gulf does not exist: the interests of the public and the interests of the man who has been born again into Good Will become identical; and the bearing of his fair share of the public burdens is to such a man a positive delight. He takes just as much satisfaction in the payment of his full taxes as he does in buying beef steak for his family or a suit of clothes for himself. He is big enough to make the taxes, and the services they perform, just as much objects of his will, as the clothes on his back or the food on his table.

The office-holder whose will is the resultant of his own personal interests will be inefficient, corrupt and corrupting. It takes a will as large and generous as Good Will to make a man in office treat that office as a trust to be executed as faithfully, as disinterestedly, as devotedly as he would attend to his private affairs. Good Will in office as the Will to make the interests of the state or country one's own will be a frequent theme with the true preacher.

Even the reformer, if he be not in his reform as a service to Good Will, finds himself caring more for his own prominence than for the success of his cause. When the men who are satisfied with, and are profiting by, the abuses he attacks, turn upon him and revile him and persecute him, he will weaken, compromise, "let up." One who would carry through to a successful issue any great reform must be patient, persistent, brave, magnanimous, good-natured, disinterested; and these qualities come and stay with a man only in so far as he makes Good Will his principle of action. The preacher may not always be able to say in detail what reforms are wise and timely and what are visionary and impracticable: but he ought to be an authoritative expert on the motives on which every reformer should prosecute his reforms; and the interpreter of Good Will as it applies to the reformer's personal attitude and temper.

These are by no means all the specific vocations and relations in which a man stands; but they are enough to make clear the vital and eternal difference between a man who lives his life and does his work from himself, by himself, and for himself, and the man who, wherever he touches the world, and his fellows, tries to make his conduct expressive of Good Will.

To keep that contrast clear before the minds, warm within the hearts, of his people is ever the preacher's mighty duty, and the layman's stupendous task. In that contrast as it works out in detail, the richness and variety of which has been only suggested, are to be found the stuff for scores of sermons. No preacher who thinks out in detail that eternal difference will ever lack for vital themes on which to preach.

If we summarize even the few specimen vocations we have considered the result will make the fundamental issue clear, and show the Gospel of Good Will in something of its splendid transforming and transfiguring power.

Who then in his vocation is the Christian? He is

Whoever as worker puts the thought of the enjoyment of the consumer alongside the thought of his pay:

Whoever as player wants the best man to win:

Whoever as employer ranks the wages and health of his workmen on a level with profits and dividends:

Whoever as employee keeps his employer's interest as clearly in mind as his own, and as warmly at heart as his union's:

Whoever as merchant by good wares at fair prices brings producer and consumer together:

Whoever as professional man rates the character, health, prosperity, of parishioners, patients, clients above popularity, station or fee:

Whoever as scientist prizes truth above fame or gain:

Whoever as teacher enjoys the mental growth of his students more than the spread of his own reputation:

Whoever as owner treats his wealth as a liability to be invested, spent and given in such proportions as on the whole will do most good:

Whoever as giver helps the recipients to become in turn also givers:

Whoever as fighter maintains good will toward his enemies on all points save the few on which he believes them to be wrong:

Whoever as writer makes his readers love good and Whoever as artist sets things as they are in the fair light of things as they should be :

Whoever as taxpayer takes positive pleasure in bearing his full, fair share of community burdens :

Whoever as citizen votes to his private injury when private and public advantage conflict :

Whoever as office-holder rates efficiency and service above honors and emoluments :

Whoever as reformer wins the hate of men who know him for the sake of men whom he never will know :

Whoever as man, wherever he touches the world, makes his fellow-men and himself equal objects of Good Will.

V

THE COST OF GOOD WILL: SACRIFICE

"She will have left an inspiring example to posterity. She has lost everything, but she has saved her own soul, and she has saved the liberties of Europe." CHARLES SAROLEA, How Belgium Saved Europe, p. 194.

THE lesson from which the text is taken is too long and detailed to quote at length. I will summarize the substance of it: giving in the author's own words only the conclusion.

Of sacrifice on a large and conspicuous scale there is no more shining modern example than the action of Belgium at the outbreak of the great war, as it is set forth by Sarolea in his "How Belgium Saved Europe." Territorially the smallest nation of Europe; half Flemish, half Walloon; half plain, half mountain; half agricultural, half manufacturing; half Catholic, half agnostic; neutral and protected in its neutrality by treaty; this nation so recently ruled by the execrable Leopold II, this little peace-loving nation, was given the twelve hours of night between seven in the evening and seven in the morning to make the most momentous decision in all her history. On the one side was the promise, if the word of a treaty-breaking, consciously wrong-doing nation can be called a promise, of the integrity of the Belgian kingdom, prompt evacuation of her territory and indemnification for damage. On this side was physical life, material comfort and uninterrupted prosperity. On the other side was the horror of an unequal war; the devastation of her country by a policy of studied and systematic frightfulness; death for thousands of her sons; poverty, starvation, or exile for millions of her citizens. Yet rather than sacrifice nationality to the risk of absorption by an aggressive, hateful and domineering autocracy; rather than sacrifice treaty rights and the civilization that rests upon them to the ambitions of treaty-breaking militarism, Belgium, single-handed and unsupported through those terrible days of August, 1914, cheerfully, unitedly, patriotically, religiously sacrificed the material to the spiritual; the individual to the social; the national to the international; and gave her little but essential contribution to the cause of humanity and liberty, democracy and essential Christianity, in the hour of its greatest danger. Belgium has suffered the loss of all things — all save her soul. But, in consequence of her sacrifice, there is still hope for the cause of national liberty and international honor; there is still hope for a peace too strong in the alliance of federated nations for any one nation however autocratic and militaristic and perverse to break; and there is the certainty that little Belgium has risen to rank with Palestine and Greece among the nations whose heroism has helped to save the world, advance the cause of civilization, and reveal anew the Godlike capacities of our common human nature.

Now that the tremendous sacrifice in blood and treasure, in the comforts of home and the shrines of art and religion has been made, we can all see that through this sacrifice Belgium has won a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory than could have come through a thousand years of ease-loving self-indulgence. As Mr. Sarolea says:—

“In order to understand the dogged resistance of the Belgians we must appeal to the deepest instincts of man, to the elemental impulses of liberty, and perhaps still more must we appeal to the higher motives of outraged justice, to the moral consciousness of right and wrong. Until we take in the fact that from the beginning the struggle was lifted to a higher plane, we shall fail to understand the true significance of the war. From the beginning the war was to the Belgian people much more than a national war: it became a Holy War. And the expression 'Holy' War must be understood not as a mere literary phrase, but in its literal and exact definition. The Belgian war was a crusade of Civilization against Barbarism, of eternal right against brute force."

"So true is this that in order adequately and clearly to realize the Belgian attitude, we are compelled to illustrate our meaning by adducing one of the most mysterious conceptions of our Christian religion, the notion of vicarious suffering. In theological language, Belgium suffered vicariously for the sake of Europe. She bore the brunt of the struggle. She was left over to the tender mercies of the invaders. She allowed herself to become a battlefield in order that France might be free from becoming a shambles. She had to have her beautiful capital violated in order that the French capitol might remain inviolate. She had to submit to vandalism in order that humanity elsewhere might be vindicated. Belgium will have lost everything. The material damage, the destruction of thousands of cities and villages, the total collapse of industry and trade are incalculable. The damage to the monuments, sacred to art and religion, is not only incalculable but irreparable. The sufferings inflicted upon millions of people baffle imagination, but the moral and spiritual gain is equally inestimable. Belgium will have proved to all the world her determination and her right to exist as a free nation. She will have earned the sympathy and admiration of the whole world. She will have left an inspiring example to posterity. She has lost everything, but she has saved her own soul; and she has saved the liberties of Europe."

If newspaper correspondents and secular writers rise to the heights of such a spiritual interpretation of current events, the Christian preacher cannot afford to preach sacrifice as merely an exceptional ancient transaction: he must measure the life of men and nations to-day by the same high standard, and proclaim an ever deepening and widening sacrifice.

The principle of sacrifice is as fundamental and universal as the laws of arithmetic. It is inherent in the very nature of choice: which cannot take one of two or more alternatives without sacrificing the others. We have already seen that sin is the sacrifice of the greater to the lesser good; and that service involves the sacrifice of the lesser to the greater good. In every specific form of service there is latent or explicit the sacrifice of some minor competing goods. Under the names of temperance — the cutting off of competing pleasure, and courage — the taking on of incidental pain, the Greeks taught the same lesson. Without sacrifice it is impossible to choose: impossible to take a single step in moral and spiritual living.

Yet fundamental and universal as sacrifice is in the spiritual life, it should never be presented as an end in itself, nor carried beyond the limits set by Good Will. For Good Will cares for us no less than for those we serve; and sacrifice beyond the point reasonable and efficient service requires is sour and silly asceticism. Hence preaching and practice should always emphasize, not the lesser good foregone, but the greater good achieved. Still sacrifice is so essential to the service of Good Will, and so likely to be either underdone or overdone, that its universal necessity and its reasonable limits will be the frequent theme of the preacher. And we shall get a concrete and vital, as distinct from abstract and theoretical insight into the laws and the limits of sacrifice if at the outset we follow, even at the risk of partial repetition, some of the same relations as in the previous chapter on service: drawing out in each case the sacrifice that is latent in the service; and showing how the efficiency of the service sets a limit to the extent of the sacrifice.

The worker who does his work with an eye to the consumer's benefit, will have to sacrifice in labor the difference between the amount required to make a poor article that will barely "get by," and a standard article that is sound, durable, and serviceable. That difference measures the portion of the Cross of Christ he has to bear.

On the other hand, to do one's work so nicely that one loses on every contract, cannot afford to buy tools, cannot pay his bills, as is the case with the over-conscientious carpenter who planes both side of plank for a plank walk, or the housewife who keeps house so immaculately that she has no time or strength left to entertain, is to defeat in large measure the very ends at which reasonable sacrifice aims. To give all the work Good Will requires in its consideration of the benefits of our work to customer and consumer, and to stop working precisely when that point is reached, is the fine art of the Christian worker's sacrifice in connection with his work.

The player who plays fair sacrifices a good many games he might win by unfair means. That is his part of the Cross of Christ. Yet it is a mistake to go as far as one eminent university president did in discountenancing curved pitching on the ground that it was intended to deceive the batter. Strategy with its incidental deception is an essential part of such games as baseball and football: and to cut that out would defeat the whole object and enjoyment of the game. When the theater, dancing, cards, billiards in any particular community have become so misused that their predominant effect on those who participate in them is degrading and demoralizing, it may then and there be part of the sacrifice Good Will requires to give them up. But wherever they can be reclaimed to their legitimate uses of recreation and wholesome social intercourse, then their reclamation rather than their renunciation is the more acceptable sacrifice to Good Will. The use and enjoyment of these amusements up to the point where they predominantly injure others or ourselves, is a much finer and harder Christian art than either their excessive indulgence or their total repudiation.

The Christian employer of labor must sacrifice whatever part of his profits and his time is necessary to make his relations with his employees brotherly and sympathetic; the conditions of their work sanitary; and their remuneration just. No employer can enjoy Good Will on less sacrificial terms.

At the same time he is not called upon ordinarily to give his employees so much that he bankrupts his business ; fails to provide for lean years, depreciation, and fluctuations in demand. He is not called ordinarily to be so extremely sacrificial that he ceases to be an employer and becomes an employee. To remain an employer and still be a Christian ; at least until there is a radical revolution in our methods of production and distribution, is the fine art which Good Will requires of the Christian employer. The preacher as a rule does not know enough about manufacturing and merchandising to draw that fine line where reasonable sacrifice ends and suicidal bankruptcy begins : but he should know enough about the sacrificial principle and its limitations to help the Christian employer to draw that line for himself and his business as Good Will directs.

The Christian employee as his part of the cross of Christ must give up sabotage, soldiering, malingering ; all malice and uncharitableness toward his employer. He must regard his employer as a brother whose interests are as precious to him as his own. Good Will, however, does not call upon him to take whatever wages and submit to whatever conditions his employer, whether individual or corporation, may seek to impose upon him. Good Will includes the workingman's rights as well as his duties ; and warrants him in insisting on the right to unite; the right to collective bargaining; the right to compensation for accident; and the right to decent conditions of labor. It is better for society and better for the employer in the long run, as well as better for the workingman that he should have these rights: and the preacher of Good Will is bound to stand by him and encourage him in all reasonable and unmalicious ways in which he seeks to secure and maintain his rights. Needless oppression; needlessly low wages; needless unsanitary conditions of labor are no part of the cross Good Will imposes on the workingman. It asks no workingman to be content with his wages unless those wages represent under prevailing conditions his fair share of the combined product of labor, capital, risk, and skill of superintendence. And it does not require him to be content with prevailing conditions, if he is — not sentimentally desirous — but reasonably sure of a practicable better economic order which would give fairer distribution without vastly lessened production. All the workingman is called upon to sacrifice is his laziness, his selfishness, his malice, his hostility, his recklessness and irresponsibility. Whatever Good Will for him, for his employer, and for society permits, he is at liberty to pursue with all his might. Only what Good Will forbids toward society, toward his employer, toward himself, is he as a Christian employee called on to forego.

The Christian merchant's share in the cross of Christ is the sacrifice of all profits over and above his fair reward for bringing commodities to the customer at the time and place, of the quality and quantity desired. Such reward must include interest on capital, risk, loss on unsold goods and bad bills, skill, taste, and many other things besides the money and labor cost of keeping and selling the articles sold. But extra profits on inferior goods: extra profits on misrepresentation; extra profits on taking unfair advantage of monopoly or the customer's ignorance; extra profits secured in any way which involves treating the customer in a way he would not be willing to be treated if he knew all the facts: extra profits in short due to any act or attitude inconsistent with Good Will toward both merchant and customer, the merchant must forego who would live as a Christian in the fellowship of Good Will. The banker, the landlord, the promoter, all who exchange one valuable thing or certificate of value for another come under this searching requirement of the Christian merchant. To sell for more than, all things justly and broadly considered, the buyer would willingly pay; in other words for more than Good Will would have him pay; is to cease to be a Christian. But that requirement, severe and searching as it is, leaves ample room for large returns for large and valuable service in the difficult spheres of exchange and distribution. Even on these terms a Christian merchant may make a great deal of money. Good Will gives him his just dues.

Judged by Christian standards, in the light of Good Will, there is not the sharp difference between the professional man and the ordinary laborer or business man which is usually drawn. Like every worker and trader the lawyer, physician or preacher is bound by Good Will to give for a fair and reasonable fee or salary his best services. The only difference is as we have seen that the professional man, by virtue of his long and costly technical training, is an expert, while his clients, patients and parishioners are not: and consequently they cannot judge as readily as the buyer of ordinary goods and services whether or not they are getting the best that skill and diligence can give them, on terms which, counting cost, preparation and quality of service, are fair and reasonable. For that they are mainly dependent on the honor of the professional man. In that sense, and in that only, the professions are more honorable — require and deserve on the average a higher type of honor — than other vocations. All workers, laborers, merchants, manufacturers, professional men, to be Christians, must charge for their services what Good Will for all concerned allows. But since those concerned have not as adequate ability to check up the quality of the services and the reasonableness of the charges of the professional man, as they have in the case of non-professional workers, the professional man therefore stands to that extent in a little more intimate responsibility to Good Will. If he is not a Christian, Good Will fails more completely of being done, and with less opportunity for redress, than if non-professional men in their vocations are disobedient. The professional man, however, is himself an object as well as a subject of Good Will, and reasonable provision for his own comfort, and the dignity of his profession, is part of his Christian service.

The scientist has his specific cross. Formerly astronomical, geological, biological truth; to-day economic, political, social truth, is frequently unpopular; clashing with ancient prejudices, vested interests, the mental inertia of the aged and the well-to-do. There are places where the speaking of the truth would deprive a man of his professor's chair, his pulpit, his political office, his reputation, his livelihood. The man who holds any of these things above truth has no part or lot in Good Will.

When a scholar's views clash with tradition, prejudice, or profit, the sacrifice of everything inconsistent with the truth as he sees it, even if it be his reputation, his position, his living, must be made cheerfully and bravely as the price of continued fellowship with Good Will, with Christ, and with all sincere Christian men. The scholar, however, is not under obligation to carry a chip on his shoulder, and provoke popular animosity by defiant proclamation in aggressive form of every new view he comes to hold.

The teacher, the educational administrator, has a heavy cross to bear. Many schools, many so-called Christian colleges even, are honeycombed with shirking, superficiality, compromise, unreality, inefficiency, favoritism, slipshod ways of instruction, finance and management. Good Will requires every teacher, superintendent, principal, president so to carry its intellectual and moral standards; the genuine training of the students; and the service to the community through them, on mind and heart, that whatever loss of popularity, loss of numbers, loss of athletic prominence those standards and that training for service require will be cheerfully borne as the price of being Christian. Most teachers in schools and many teachers in colleges have an amount and conditions of work put upon them which are inconsistent with giving their individual pupils all that they really need. But whoever as teacher accepts as his or her ideal anything less than the best for those pupils his time, training, strength and executive ability enables him to give, becomes thereby unchristian. Judged by what Good Will requires administrator and teacher to do for their pupils, and for society through them, Christian schools and colleges are still as rare as the sacrifices required to make them truly Christian are costly. At the same time the Christian teacher is not called upon to kill himself by overwork; still less by worry. Good Will includes the teacher's welfare.

The cross of the rich Christian, as Jesus pointed out, is a peculiarly heavy one. To make his money serviceable to Good Will involves so much weighing of the worth of one investment against another; of one benefaction against another; of one expenditure against another; and of each investment against all benefactions and expenditures; of each benefaction against all investments and expenditures; and of each expenditure against all investments and benefactions, that those of us who have little wealth may well breathe a sigh of relief. For not until the amounts and proportions of all these uses of property are — not infallibly, for that is impossible — but conscientiously determined as Good Will for all concerned directs, can the rich man fully enter or remain in the Kingdom of Good Will. Investments that depend for profits on hard or dishonest dealings, benefactions prompted by relief from importunity or desire for popularity, expenditures on self and family that do not represent in happiness and efficiency more value not only to them but to the world than would any practicable alternative, shut the door of the Kingdom of Good Will in the rich man's face. Having more than others, he is called to sacrifice more: for apart from sacrifice no man can see God, or know Christ, or have fellowship with men and women who are really Christian.

At the same time the rich Christian is not ordinarily called upon to give away all his goods. That would be a much easier and a much more useless and mischievous act in most cases, than to use them in proportionate service. Good Will includes the rich man's usefulness and happiness; and reasonable care for that is part of his Christian task.

Whoever gives and is known to give assumes a serious sacrifice of which the money given is often the least serious part. Multitudes of beggars, agents, representatives of benevolent causes swoop down upon him; and if he will give according to Good Will, he must sift these claims, dividing the unworthy from the worthy, making a scale of those which through merit, propinquity or affinity with his own intelligent interest, should take precedence. He will have to say "no" oftener than "yes." He will get more criticism than gratitude; yet he must take it all good-naturedly and continue to give. For complaint, ingratitude, misunderstanding, is the price every giver has to pay for giving not where it is easiest and most popular; but where his judgment, interest and location make it possible to do most good and least harm.

Promiscuous, indiscriminate giving almost always does far more harm than good. The benefactor himself, as well as his beneficiaries, is dear to Good Will and is justified in protecting himself against perpetual importunity, and the damage that giving without careful investigation into need, character and efficiency is almost sure to do. A little given discriminatingly and wisely is much more acceptable than much given promiscuously and foolishly. The preacher, at the same time that he trains his wealthy and poor alike to give as an inescapable part of their sacrifice to Good Will, must do all in his power to protect them from irresponsible agents, lazy loafers, organizations that beg money and maintain officers for obsolete or fantastic ends, and institutions that seek endowment in order to grow bigger rather than to be content with doing better the modest task to which their present funds are adequate.

The sacrifice of the Christian soldier, in addition to those which are inherent in the profession, and which every soldier must make, is the repression of all malice toward those whom he fights. Good Will permits no "Song of hate"; but requires that the hands be outstretched in helpfulness to the enemy the instant he surrenders. As long as evil men and nations bring on unjust wars, good men and nations must stand ready to fight in self-defence and in defence of humanity and civilization: and while Good Will sets limits to hate and malice it sets none to the energy and efficiency with which unavoidable war while it lasts shall be prosecuted. A man or nation, however, that fights where arbitration is a practicable substitute for war, fails utterly of the sacrificial spirit which is essential to fellowship in Good Will.

The writer and the artist are called to sacrifice the easy gain and cheap fame which can be had by any writer or artist of mediocre ability who will play on the prejudice or inflame the passions of blind and brutal men.

Fame and gain come to the true artist and author; but there are stages in their careers when they must take less of these for the sake of more beauty, truth, purity and love. Apart from such sacrifice, actual at some time, potential at all times, no poet, painter, sculptor, can be spiritually great.

This however is not to say that harm to some may not be part, and a legitimate and inevitable part, of strong, brave handling of unpleasant facts. If the creative God in his Good Will permits incidental evil, as we well know he does, the creative artist and author cannot expect to escape the same conditions and the same necessity. Evil that is not chosen for its own sake, but accepted as the condition of greater good on the whole is no more culpable in the human artist than in the divine. This limitation on the sacrifice of artist and author leaves him all the freedom in his art a great artist needs and a good artist wants.

Sacrifice is an element in all personal relations. The deeper the relation, the higher the sacrifice. A friend is a second self: he doubles our joys and multiplies our interests. But his problems at the same time become our problems: his burdens our burdens: his disabilities our disabilities: his failings our failings: to be shared in sympathy, and removed by helpfulness. Friendship that seeks only gain is not friendship, but selfishness posing in friendship's attire. The preacher must hold his people up to this sacrificial side of their friendships and affections.

The lover who lives and loves in Good Will must sacrifice all gratifications of passion that are inconsistent with the orderly and decent life of family and society; that would rob woman of her self-respect and social standing, and children of their birthright of physical health in a pure and happy home. In youth, and in the bachelorhood prolonged by the necessity of getting an economic footing before a family can be supported, this sacrifice, where the opportunities for indulgence are wide open and importunate; where strain of work is intense; and hours of leisure are either empty or filled with recreations that are suggestive and stimulative of passion, this sacrifice often seems a very heavy one to pay, day after day, year after year, through the period when physical vigor is at its maximum. Good Will however requires it: on no easier terms can Christian fellowship, and the complete self-respect that goes with it, be had. All honor to the splendid fellows, more numerous in America to-day than anywhere else in the world, or ever before, who have the strength and self-control to pay that heavy price! They are God's chosen ones who bear the brunt of civilization's battle with our uneliminated brutality.

In our admiration and our sympathy we must never forget or let them forget, that love in all its expressions is intrinsically good, not evil: and we must work by hospitality, social centers, wholesome and happy opportunities for intimacy between young men and young women to make life before marriage as normal as possible, and early marriage the privilege of as many as possible. It is not love or passion, or the natural attraction of the sexes for each other that we are called upon to sacrifice; but its cruel perversions. To pure love that blesses all it touches there is no limit set by God's Good Will or man's just laws.

When friendship and love pass into marriage and found the family, the joy and gladness of life reach their highest point. Well-married husbands and wives come closest to heaven. But with the gladness come sorrows: with the joy, and as its counterpart, come the greatest sacrifices one is ever called on to make: harder in some respects even than the sacrifice of the soldier when he enlists for war. For when two persons rightly marry, each gives up not only exclusive ownership in the income of his property: but himself as a self-sufficient independent being. Henceforth, his property, however the legal title may run, is common property: his interests are predominantly common interests: his life is a common life: what is good for both is the aim of each. Expenditures of time, money, strength: indulgences in amusements and recreation: risks in enterprise and investment which before were pardonable or even praiseworthy, now in competition with common interests and responsibilities become undesirable and even culpable. The glory of the new conjunct life condemns pretty much all that is exclusive in the old individualistic life. Both the man and the woman have become not merely new creatures; but one new creature in whom neither retains the old self.

The ideal of this relation is to have all things in common: talking over expenditures, undertakings, pleasures, duties, until the will of both is expressed in every act and interest of each. The next best thing, often the best practicable, is that the mutual interest shall be acknowledged once for all in general terms: and then by allowances of money: free disposal of time: liberty in forming circles of acquaintance: opportunity for all kinds of social life: each shall trust the other, and be trusted in turn, to work out the details of such individual self-expression as shall enrich the common life: and to renounce such ambitions, whether of clubs. or dissipations, or speculations, as are merely divisive and tangential: taking one out of the family life in a way or to an extent inconsistent with enriched and enriching return.

The preacher should make his people appreciate, expect and prepare for this strain of readjustment as an inevitable part of the blessedness of married life. And in individual cases that seek or will accept his pastoral counsel he should help them and hold them to this inevitable sacrifice as the noble and costly side of the relation which he expects them to be too strong and brave to shirk in selfish querulousness, or evade in cowardly divorce.

Our greatest, if not our deepest blessings, come through our country: its institutions, its laws, its liberties, its protection of person and property. Here again sacrifices commensurate with these great boons are required of every person who worthily receives them. Cheerful payment of one's full fair share of taxes; generous devotion of time and strength to the formation and promulgation of sound policies; faithful work at the primaries and the polls; readiness at personal cost to seek and hold office oneself; help to put the right men into office and to keep the wrong men out, are the least a man of Good Will should do as a citizen.

Finally as the crown and consummation of this practical devotion, day after day, year after year, in times of peace, comes the duty and privilege and glory of giving his life, or the life of husband or son, to the service of his country in just and righteous war. The man of Good Will however must rise higher than nationalism in his patriotism. President Wilson at the close of his message in December, 1915, called attention to the new era on which we have entered. It is the era in which we have had the greatness of world-concerns thrust upon our attention. We cannot think world-thoughts worthily without being prepared for whatever sacrifice our world-responsibilities may call. Not in readiness for aggression or insolent interference in the affairs of other nations: but in sympathy for all who are in disorder and oppression, we must be strong enough to render our reasonable and proportionate service; by peace wherever peaceful arbitration is possible: by war wherever righteous war is unavoidable. The nation that lives up to the Gospel of Good Will must accept the perpetual sacrifice which world-wide responsibility involves. On no easier or cheaper terms can any nation rise from nominal to vital Christianity. The more we prepare for war in this spirit, the more zealous shall we be to avoid war and wherever possible to establish justice through arbitration and treaty. Here as everywhere sacrifice is not made for itself. The fearful sacrifice of war is one to be prepared for at all times: but actually to be made only when every device of patience, remonstrance, arbitration, and negotiation has proved unavailing. To have military power is a national necessity: to use it save as a last desperate resort is a national disgrace.

The Gospel of Good Will requires the Nation to bring reasonable military preparedness to the altar: but it bids the nation search earnestly in the thicket for the tangled ram of such conciliation as will save the actual sacrifice of its sons on the red altar of war. Every Christian nation must stand ready to do what Belgium did in 1914. But we hope and pray that the spread of the Gospel of Good Will may render the actual offering of so costly a sacrifice never again a national necessity.

Sacrifice in every case is the obverse of service: the price we have to pay in private loss for personal or social gain. That price must be paid in each case up to the limit where more sacrifice would involve less effective service; and less efficiency of the servant for future service. All the wealth and popularity that can be maintained without compromise of principle it is the Christian's duty to secure and maintain. For Good

Will includes him along with his country, his constituents, his cause: and justifies him in taking for himself such remuneration and support as is not inconsistent with the best good of others and of all.

The supreme sacrifice is that of Jesus Christ: and it was made, like our sacrifices, in loyalty to his vocation and his personal relationships. He felt called to preach the Gospel of Good Will in a community and an age where formalism, legalism, Pharisaism were on the throne. To preach effectively this Gospel under these conditions was to bring down on his head the hatred, jealousy and spite of those who were wedded to and profiting by these false gospels. By keeping quiet, or by confining his ministry to remote rural regions, he could have escaped the enmity of the rulers at the nation's capital. Such a policy of self-protection, however, would have made him false to his calling; unfaithful to the unshepherded sheep on whose superstitions the formalistic wolves were all too prone to prey. He refused to save himself by sacrificing the truth, and sacrificing his fellow-men who were entitled to hear the truth from his lips, and see it in his life. In fidelity to his vocation as the Son of Man, the typical representative of humanity, the Savior of the world, he proclaimed his truth boldly, aggressively, persistently; and sacrificed his life to do it. So long as he could teach it more effectively by living than by dying, he postponed his trip to Jerusalem; and escaped out of the midst of his enemies. But when open attack at the cost of his life was the most effective witness against error and for truth, he did not flinch from drinking the full cup of torture, ignominy, and death. True to his vocation as revealer and teacher of the highest spiritual truth, he laid down his life. For the full enjoyment of that Gospel, and its diffused spirit and multiplied fruits throughout the world, we are indebted to him and to his sacrifice. The preacher is abundantly justified in making that sacrifice the central theme in his preaching, provided he preaches it not merely as a sacrifice made once for all to appease an estranged God; but a sacrifice we must all repeat in faithful and heroic devotion to our daily tasks and social relationships.

BY-PRODUCTS OF GOOD WILL: THE CHRISTIAN VIRTUES

“My religion is very simple. I love God and all my brothers.”
CHARLES RANN KENNEDY, The Servant in the House, p. 22.

THESE words of our text are spoken by Manson, who represents Christ. He comes into the Vicar's household in the disguise of a servant, and in the regular course of his service, and the conversations incidental to it, separates in that household the sheep from the goats. The text contains his separating principle. If Good Will for all your brothers is your aim you go to his right hand. If honors and emoluments, promotions and preferments for yourself are your aim, then even though those honors and emoluments happen to be ecclesiastical, your place is on the left, and your destination the outer darkness.

There is in the play only one hopelessly lost soul — only one that even Christ can't save. He is James Ponsonby Makeshyfte, D.D., the Most Reverend the Lord Bishop of Lancashire. And why can't Christ save him? Why does he turn him out of the house? Because his real motto is: "Give as little, and grab as much as we can"; because there are spheres of human Good which he despises; because he is unwilling to sit at the table with a working-man; because he fails to include in his idea of good the welfare of the working-man; because his will is no bigger than his personal interests, and the dignities and emoluments of his ecclesiastical office. A man can't be as little as that, and share in the fellowship of Manson, Christ. For Christ's fellowship is not primarily an affair of learned lore, stained-glass windows, and ecclesiastical millinery: all of which the Bishop has in abundance: it is genuine love of God and all his brothers, which the Bishop utterly lacks.

The Vicar, the Reverend William Smythe, is half lost, half saved: and in the end is saved so as by fire. He has climbed to ecclesiastical preferment by taking unfair advantage of his poor brother whom he drove to a life of dissipation: and by listening to the false and foolish advice of his ambitious wife, who loves him more than she loves God, and is more anxious to see him win a great reputation as scholar and preacher and churchman than to see him doing the greatest good to his people. There is this sign of genuineness about him, however, that he heartily despises the Bishop, and can't endure to have the old hypocrite around poisoning the air of his house. Under Manson's influence he becomes sincerely sorry for the wrong he has done his dissolute brother, Robert Smith, a humble scavenger. In the end he shakes off the selfishly ambitious influence of his too fond wife, joins his humble brother in doing the disagreeable and dirty work of cleaning out the church drain, because that happens to be what the people really need to have done. His repudiation of his wife's baleful influence is the turning point. She cares nothing for his real usefulness, everything for his preferment, as comes out in their conversation.

AUNTIE

(Now thoroughly afraid.) What do you mean by the truth, William?

VICAR

I mean this: What is the building of this church to you? Are you so mightily interested in architecture, in clerical usefulness, in the furtherance of God's work?

AUNTIE

I am interested in your work, William. Do you take me for an atheist?

VICAR

No: far worse — for an idolater!

AUNTIE

William —

VICAR

What else but idolatry is this precious husband-worship you have set up in your heart — you and all the women of your kind? You barter away your own souls in the service of it: you build up your idols in the fashion of your own respectable desires: you struggle silently amongst yourselves, one against another, to push your own god foremost in the miserable little pantheon of prigs and hypocrites you have created!

AUNTIE

(Roused.) It is for your own good we do it!

VICAR

Our own good! What have you made of me? You have plucked me down from whatever native godhead I had by gift of heaven, and hewed and hacked me into the semblance of your own idolatrous imagination! By God, it shall go on no longer! If you have made me less than a man, at least I will prove myself to be a priest!

AUNTIE

Do you call it a priest's work to—

VICAR

It is my work to deliver you and me from the bondage of lies! Can't you see, woman, that God and Mammon are about us, fighting for our souls?

AUNTIE

(Determinedly.) Listen to me, William, listen to me —

VICAR

I have listened to you too long!

AUNTIE

You would always take my counsel before —

VICAR

All that is done with! I am resolved to be a free man from this hour — free of lies, free of love if needs be, free even of you, free of everything that clogs and hinders me in the work I have to do! I will do my own deed, not yours!

AUNTIE

(With deadly quietness.) If I were not certain of one thing, I could never forgive you for those cruel words: William, this is some madness of sin that has seized you: it is the temptation of the devil!

VICAR

It is the call of God!

Yet even the ambitious wife is saved after much protestation. When the Vicar finally joins his humble brother, takes off his coat and sets about the dirty and dangerous work of cleaning out the drain, she is brought to give him her blessing, "God's might go with you, William! Accept him, Christ!" and she is last seen taking with one hand her husband's hand, and with her other hand the hand of his humble and formerly wronged and despised scavenger brother, so that the three form a kind of cross.

The real church Manson or Christ is building, the church Robert, the drain-digger, belongs to, the church to which he and Manson win his Vicar brother and his ambitious wife, "ain't psalms, and 'ymns and old maids' tea parties, mind you"; it is "no dead pile of stones and unmeaning timber; no aggregation of Gothic arches and stained-glass windows."

"When you enter it you hear a sound as of some mighty poem chanted. Listen long enough, and you will learn that it is made up of the beating of human hearts, of the nameless music of men's souls — that is, if you have ears. If you have eyes, you will presently see the church itself — a looming mystery of many shapes and shadows, leaping sheer from floor to dome; the work of no ordinary builder!

“The pillars of it go up like the brawny trunks of heroes: the sweet human flesh of men and women is moulded about its bulwarks, strong, impregnable: the faces of little children laugh out from every cornerstone: the terrible spans and arches of it are the joined hands of comrades; and up in the heights and spaces there are inscribed the numberless musings of all the dreamers of the world. It is yet building — building and built upon. Sometimes the work goes forward in deep darkness: sometimes in blinding light: now beneath the burden of unutterable anguish: now to the tune of a great laughter and heroic shoutings like the cry of thunder. Sometimes in the silence of the night-time one may hear the tiny hammerings of the comrades at work up in the dome — the comrades that have climbed ahead.”

Robert Smith, the dissipated scavenger brother, understands and is drawn to that church. “I think I begin to understand you, comride, especially that bit abaht the ‘ammerins an’ the harches. S’pose there’s drain ‘ands wanted in that there church o’ yours?” He goes in to dig the drains. With all his bad record he has two redeeming traits. He is tender to his long-lost, new-found daughter, and he works — works for the good he can do. “I work — and work well; that’s more than some of 'em can say — and I don't get much money for it either." When reminded by the Vicar of the stench and horror and darkness of his drain digging, he replies, "What's it matter, if the comrides up above 'av' light an' joy an' a breath of 'olesome air to sing by? 'Igh in the dome, the 'ammerins of the comrides as 'av' climbed aloft!" And when the Vicar in deepest penitence says, "I call myself nothing: I am nothing — less than nothing in all this living world," Robert, proud of the place in the service of the whole his humble vocation gives him, exclaims, "But I call myself summat — I'm the DRAIN-MAN, that's what I am." His place and function of service, his humble share in doing God's Good Will, makes him brother of Manson, the Servant in the House — Christ.

That is a Gospel every right-minded man in the world accepts as soon as he clearly sees it. Of course it is hard to give a twenty-minute sermon the clearness and force of a well-acted two-and-a-half-hours play. But if we take the same theme; show the greatness and glory of Good Will however humbly done; we shall get something of that response which this great play wherever presented has evoked. Good Will, whether in a play or sermon, is the only thing big enough to make a thoughtful man give all his little self possesses in happy whole-hearted exchange. All the Christian virtues flow out of this love for God and all one's brothers: this devotion to their real good regardless of the honors and emoluments one's service to them may involve.

Christian character, and all its constituent virtues, are by-products of living in Good Will. To aim at character directly; to cultivate the Christian virtues like Benjamin Franklin, giving one day to patience, another to chastity, another to generosity, is to miss altogether the Christian point of view, and become a conceited prig. If we trust and serve Good Will, all these graces will come trooping after us. But if sought directly they fly beyond our reach.

The most characteristic Christian virtue is modesty; or as the New Testament calls it meekness, humility, poverty of spirit, not being puffed up. One who sees how vast is Good Will; what splendid achievements it is making; and how much remains to be done; will come to see how small and how imperfect is his little contribution to the great whole. A young Christian, like a novice at any work or sport, may be filled with self-importance, and say and do things to show off his newly acquired accomplishments. But it is the sure mark of the novice — this self-centered, self-conscious air of importance and superiority. He who has come to admire Good Will in Christ and his fellow-Christians, and has learned to measure himself by that perfect standard, will understand how far his best achievements fall short of it; and will be modest as a matter of course; as the inevitable corollary of the plain fact of his manifold shortcomings. Whoever like the Bishop in the play is proud and puffed up, has failed to see Good Will and his own true place far below its high requirements. To cultivate modesty directly is impossible: for the more we think we have of it, the less modest we are. But Good Will, by its contrast with our imperfect wills, induces modesty. The preacher will teach his people to measure themselves and each other by that searching standard.

Purity of heart is likewise directly unattainable. The more we dwell on it, the more we are conscious by contrasts of the lusts over which purity is the victory. Dwelling on it even for the purpose of preaching it to others is spiritually ultra-hazardous. The more we think about purity the less pure we become. As Pascal says, "Few persons think of modesty modestly, or of chastity chastely." On the contrary, if we live in Good Will for all men and women, out of that thought will flow a reverent and tender regard for all that concerns their welfare: most tender and most reverent in reference to those sacred instincts and functions on which the perpetuation of the race through the union of the sexes is so beautifully based. The Christian preacher will seek purity for his people, not by exhortation to it, but by deepening their reverence for Good Will in its provision for love as the fountain of life.

Gentleness is a sickly, sentimental affair when cultivated for its own sake ; and marks the mollicoddle and the sissy. Hard, coarse, rough brutality is more manly. But the gentleness that comes of keeping before one's eyes and in one's heart Good Will is strong and firm. It refuses to hurt another's feelings, not from fear or weakness, but because that other person is a child of the Father, a brother or sister of Christ, an actual or potential agent of Good Will. To harm another by word or deed is to hurt what is dear to oneself — a stupid contradiction. From one in whom Good Will dwells, no harsh act, no cross look, no cruel word will come : because such acts and looks and words contradict the Good Will which is one's inmost principle of life. To be sure we have lapses here more than elsewhere ; for our looks and tones and acts reflect too often not what we permanently mean to be ; but what we lapse into in ungarded moments. Yet if these be promptly followed by repentance and the request for forgiveness, they cannot destroy the gentleness which is what every disciple of Good Will seeks to express. The preacher, then, will preach not gentleness directly; but the devotion to Good Will out of which gentleness inevitably flows.

Charitableness likewise, when cultivated directly, is an easy-going, indifferent, almost effeminate quality. But when it comes as the result of living in Good Will for others, it is at once keenly critical and kindly merciful toward their faults and failings. The Christian sees in his brother's failing a defeat of Good Will for him: and he cannot help being sorry, and hoping for better things next time. He cannot rejoice in another's iniquity; both he and his brother are included in the Good Will which it is his precious privilege to serve. Good Will therefore is the seed of which charitableness is the fruit.

Cheerfulness, or as the New Testament calls it, hope, is another Christian grace which the preacher cannot profitably exhort his people to cultivate, but which will surely follow wherever Good Will is preached persuasively. Accident, sickness, poverty, loneliness, unpopularity, failure, sin, bereavement, death — one or more of these evils confront us most of the time: no one can escape them altogether. Earthquake, tornado, volcano, conflagration, flood, insect pests, war, unemployment, over-production, imperfect distribution, robbery, theft, failure of employers or debtors, breakdown of character of those in whom our lives are bound up, events wholly or largely beyond our foresight and control, bring upon us suffering and loss. If we are merely children of nature, desiring the good things these misfortunes take away, then we shall be at the mercy of these accidents, bereft and comfortless.

The Christian preacher, however, offers the sufferer a chance to serve and share Good Will. Here in human history, in human hearts, in human homes, in Christ and the spirit of Christian men and women, in ourselves so far as we are Christian, we see, and taste, and touch and handle a Good Will which would not willingly subject those whom it loves to suffering. This is the best thing we know in the world. Therefore we believe it is the purpose for which the world was made. We know that we cannot shield those we love from all these incidental and accidental evils. We do not know or believe that God could do it in a world like this, where finite forces follow their own unvarying laws, and finite wills follow their own always imperfect and often perverse devices. Good Will is not omnipotent in the sense that it can produce any specific result it pleases, regardless of the conditions of life in a rational and law-abiding world. Prayer which rests on and fosters that delusion is perverse; fatal to true worship and rational comfort. If getting what we happen to want out of an arbitrarily omnipotent God is the kind of comfort his people crave, then the frank and honest thing for the preacher to say is that there is no such comfort to be had; and the persons who are weak and foolish enough to ask for it, would not be worthy of it, even if it were to be had. No: God's Good Will is conditioned by the rational laws of its own uniform and beneficent operation. It can achieve supernatural results; but they are supernatural in the sense of being above what the merely natural heart of man could accomplish; not in being above what law will permit.

Good Will is still at work in the world and at war with evil, even when evil strikes us most severely. It is blessing others, even when in some few particular respects the general order it permits hurts us: and we can rejoice in its blessing of others; help it on; and so share its outgoing to others; be its agents; have it in our hearts. And if we are fruitful, and keep on having Good Will toward others; in due time others who have Good Will, will recognize a kindred spirit in us and welcome us as brothers and sisters in its fellowship and service. Giving it to others; receiving it from others in return; we shall live more and more in it; and thus become more and more sure of it. Whatever accident or evil man may take away, this experience of being both object and subject of Good Will remains, and grows. We can be for Good Will at all times: and we can be assured that Good Will at all times is for us: and if that be for us, and we for it; nothing that happens can be effectively against us, or separate us from our fellowship with God, with Christ and with our fellow-Christians. We can join hands in cleaning out the drains, like the saved souls in the play: and in doing it we can be as happy as Robert Smith.

To be sure this fellowship in Good Will cannot readily be extemporized in time of trouble. Those who are not ready when the invitation comes cannot go in to the feast. Those who desired only things, and lose those things they desired, lose all; and naturally are comfortless. But those who, with the things they had, also had Good Will as the spirit of their lives; doing its service, sharing with others its fellowship, have something so much better than things, while they have things, that the best part of their life remains when the things they had are by accident or misfortune taken away. To purchase this pearl of great price they are willing to part with all their other possessions. No misfortunes can leave him bereft who keeps Good Will in his own heart; and shares with and receives from others this same precious treasure.

Sickness may take away certain powers and forms through which one has expressed and enjoyed Good Will: but it cannot rob one who really has Good Will in his own heart, and rejoices to recognize it in the hearts of his fellows, of this his most valued possession. Indeed sickness often brings out within one a devotion to and appreciation of Good Will which health, and the absorption in routine health permitted, had failed to develop. Health can express Good Will in most ways so much more effectively than sickness, either acute or chronic, that one who has it in his heart will take every reasonable precaution to be well and keep well. Yet when sickness comes, whether from exposure, or overstrain, or contagion, or one's own folly, he will find in more patient cheerfulness; in increased gratitude; in deepened tenderness, ways in which he may in part make up, and sometimes more than make up, for the forms of serving Good Will which the sickness has rendered temporarily or permanently impossible.

The rest, trust, peace, and patience which Good Will imparts to the heart in which it dwells, does much to hasten recovery and avert disease. A man or woman who regards himself or herself as the son or daughter, agent and embodiment of Good Will in the world, with some of its specific work to do and love to manifest, will be so regular in exercise, temperate in diet, restful in sleep, moderate in work, that he or she will not have a twentieth part of the ailments that overtake the man or woman who is bent on self-indulgence, or personal ambition, or social preferment, or mere business success. Christianity of this sort, altogether apart from any special theories about the nature of disease or the unreality of matter, is the greatest health-giver and life-preserver in the world. Good Will is a Gospel which, if faithfully preached and practiced, for the most part keeps its adherents well and strong; and yet when sickness does overtake them makes them patient and cheerful to bear it.

The Christian preacher must also show his people how to be contented in whatever state they are. Poverty has its consolations for one who is in Good Will. The Christian, to be sure, can express more Good Will with ample furniture of fortune than without it. He can keep workmen steadily and remuneratively employed: educate his children: support good causes and reforms: help the poor: provide for the old age of himself and his family so much better with money than without it, that for the sake of these ends, all of which are precious in the sight of Good Will, he will earn and save and invest all that he can consistently with the claims that come upon him from day to day. Yet just because he seeks and holds his wealth not for itself; and not for himself considered as a selfish individual; but for Good Will, and for himself as its agent, the best part of his wealth — the end it serves — will remain with him, even if he fails to secure the wealth; or if, after securing it, he loses it. Good Will, though in some ways it can be better served by the rich, in other ways can be effectively served by the poor. Sympathy, affection, appreciation are often better gifts and better services than those money can buy; and these the poor are often able to give more generously and naturally than the rich. The preacher will teach his people that if they really live in and for Good Will, riches or poverty, though not as the Stoics would say indifferent, is yet a minor matter. Wealth honestly gained and justly and generously used is preferable, and on the whole more serviceable; but poverty is also endurable, even welcome, as developing sympathies and charities which wealth too often stifles and stunts.

Finally the Christian who lives in Good Will develops an efficiency, an economy, a serviceableness which, not always but frequently; not universally but generally, makes him friends; finds him employment; brings him recognition, help, support; and tends to take away his poverty. All these things Good Will tends to add unto the man or woman who cheerfully, diligently, faithfully, generously gives to its service what he has, be that little or much. Robert in the play gets his daughter, his brother, and even his formerly supercilious sister-in-law in return for the humble service he renders.

The man who is trying to do right in a world that is going wrong is often like Elijah afflicted with a sense of loneliness. It is the preacher's privilege to show him that he is serving, not an unrealized ideal, but God's slowly coming, surely conquering Good Will, which generations before him have served; which millions of his contemporaries are serving, and which generations after him will serve; and that he has a great and growing companionship with Christ and an innumerable company of fellow-Christians. Nor will the minister permit this companionship in Good Will to remain permanently one-sided. He will make sure that this man is recognized, appreciated, befriended, loved, by some other sons and daughters of Good Will, and welcomed into the intimacy of a friendship founded on this common bond.

The man who lives in and works for Good Will at times gets criticised, makes himself unpopular: and is persecuted for righteousness' sake. All manner of evils said against him falsely; because there are sure to be persons with whose interests his service of Good Will fails to coincide. All the ultra-conservatives in politics and religion; all the thoughtless and reckless radicals; all the grafters; all the selfishly sensitive; all the illiberal sentimental; all the hypocrites; all the Scribes and Pharisees; all the Bishop Makeshifites, at one time or another are bound to be against the man who disinterestedly and conscientiously makes Good Will his principle of conduct. Woe to him if these people speak well of him; for it is a sure sign that Good Will is feebly apprehended and timidly performed. To be alone and to be reviled is hard. But to be sure that one is saying and doing what Good Will, and all its honest and enlightened sons, desire one to say and do, is not to be alone; but to have the support and approval of the best company on earth and in heaven. Living in such high and wide fellowship, one can stand the criticism and condemnation of those who are out of it; or only imperfectly and unintelligently in it. Here again, usually but not always, in the long run the man who consistently does the Good Will soon or late comes to have his integrity recognized; comes to be loved by those who share with him the same high service; and even to be respected by the very men whom he disinterestedly opposes; and who from self-interest continue to oppose and maltreat him. It is the preacher's richest privilege to give the man who is persecuted for righteousness' sake the assurance and the experience of this divine and human support.

Failure is much harder to bear than criticism. To work long and hard; to do one's best; and then from one's own miscalculation, or defect, or blunder; or from the ingratitude, greed or treachery of others to fail of the result at which one aims, is very hard to bear. If that is the whole story it is almost unendurable. Yet to the man who lives in Good Will that is not the whole story. He may fail to secure the specific object at which he aimed; but the preacher stands before him and by his side to assure him that he cannot fail to be in Good Will, unless by his own fault he falls out of it. The effort he puts forth counts as just so much added strength to the cause of Good Will in the world. The training acquired in this defeat; the influence exerted; the protest registered; will all be helpful in the renewal of the same general campaign at other points and at later dates. No effort put forth in the service of Good

Will can ever be lost. As the location of the ball on the gridiron at any given time, and the final score, are the resultants of all the efforts put forth on both sides; on the side of the losers as well as on the side of the winners; so the preacher will tell men Good Will is stronger, and its triumph sooner, in consequence of every ounce of energy, every unit of resolution, every atom of intelligence any defeated man has put forth in its behalf. Many battles may be lost; many soldiers may be slain; many captains may be vanquished: but the campaign, the cause, Good Will goes marching on: and every faithful fighter in its behalf; every honest worker in its service, has his share in the conquest he helps to achieve. Even his partial and temporary failure contributes its part to hasten the eternal and total triumph. And here too whoever keeps on fighting and working in Good Will draws soon or late to his side supporters and comrades with whose aid he makes his defeats progressively less, and his victories increasingly frequent.

Every man has defects and handicaps, makes blunders, says and does foolish things of which he is heartily ashamed. Yet if one is heartily devoted to Good Will, and sure of his place in its favor, even his acute mistakes and chronic failings cannot cast him down. Here or there, again and again, he may be a discredit to himself and to the Good Will he seeks to serve. But the preacher is there by his side to tell him that Good Will is so magnanimous; its service is so varied; that no man is so awkward and clumsy, so stupid or ill-trained, so inefficient and incompetent, but that on many sides and in many ways outwardly, and altogether in his heart inwardly, he can be its useful, honorable servant and well-beloved son. The preacher will tell him that if a man makes up his mind and sets his heart to count oneness with Good Will the supreme thing for which he cares; the one thing on which he stakes his happiness: he will find that no physical disabilities; no mental weaknesses; no social disqualifications; no spiritual dulness, can separate him from what he most desires. The only disqualification that can exclude the humblest from the wedding feast is the deliberate neglect to put on the wedding garment that is freely offered to all invited guests — the garment of Good Will.

In addition to our own sins and the sorrow and shame they bring, we have to bear the effects of the sins of others: the sins of a dishonest partner; the sins of an unfaithful or drunken husband; the sins of a dissolute son or a wayward daughter; the sins of competitors who make honest dealing almost financially suicidal; the sins of slanderers that destroy our good name; the sins of employers who break down our health; the sins of rulers that misrepresent us and plunge us into extravagance, or debt, or war.

If we are mere children of nature, craving the good things of which the sins of others deprive us, we shall be soured, embittered, dejected, comfortless. But the preacher is ordained to assure us that if we believe in Good Will, working for the good of us and of others; if we enter eagerly, generously, bravely into its service, we shall have its fellowship and cheer; and that is so much deeper and stronger and sweeter than anything any wrong-doer can take from us that we shall be optimists even in an environment in which to all outward appearance everything makes for pessimism.

The wives of drunken and brutal husbands; the husbands of insincere and ostentatious wives; the employees of heartless corporations and the employers of shiftless help; merchants who are crushed by cruel competition; investors who are fleeced by unscrupulous manipulators; friends who are alienated by mischief-makers; lovers who are separated by worldly parents or gossiping mischief-makers: — all who suffer unjustly from the wrongdoing of others are welcome to enter through the open door of disinterested devotion the blessed fellowship of Good Will, and of all its sincere, simple, straightforward disciples. Here is comfort free for all; which Good Will alone can give; and which no other man's evil will can ever take away. Whoever wishes to live in Good Will can have what he wishes for the asking. "Ask and ye shall receive; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." Understood not of a future, far-off heaven; but of a present and intimate fellowship in Good Will, this and a host of kindred Scripture invitations become self-evident on the lips of the preacher who has the insight and tact to utter them at the right time and in the right way to the afflicted persons who need to hear them.

Faith in immortality, grounded in faith in Good Will, is a distinctively Christian grace. Bereavement is the severest of the sufferings to which we are subjected, and for this the preacher must provide a comfort which is at once genuine and noble. Union based on mutual sharing of Good Will is the highest, holiest, sweetest thing we know here on earth: and the more we appreciate it; the more we live by it, in it, and for it, the surer we grow that it is the end for which the world exists and for which we were born; and that the separation of death cannot utterly defeat and destroy it. Proof in the sense of physical evidence of physical survival, so that the physical order would be incomplete and contradictory without it, there is none. But we have moral and spiritual evidence of immortality in the sense that our highest and holiest affections ; our deepest and tenderest aspirations ; our bravest and noblest sacrifices would be put to permanent confusion and futility if what we hold so precious and strive so hard to be worthy of were withheld. In that case we should be better, kinder, braver, than the world of which we are a part. Good Will as reflected in human hearts would be left unrelated to a kindred Good Will at the heart of things ; a mere temporary sport of chance coming from and going to an order inferior to itself, yet triumphing over it. This the greatest spirits of our race, those who have most fully entered into and worked for Good Will, steadfastly refuse to believe. Expectation of eternal service and fellowship in Good Will gives him who has it such a dignity and worth ; such a strength and calm, that the experience of it in ourselves, or the appreciation of it in others, goes far to prove it "too fair to turn out false." Most persons who, like Jesus and Paul, have suffered much and advanced far in this enlarging and uplifting fellowship simply cannot believe in, any more than they can will, the extinction of a life and love so precious. This assurance of faith, attested by the vast majority of the faithful, it is the preacher's honest privilege to offer for the comfort of all who mourn the loss through death of those whom the fellowship of Good Will had ennobled and endeared.

Our own certain death, if we are living in this faith, gives us no anxiety and no alarm. There as here, forever as now, we serenely trust Good Will to make a heaven which it will be our privilege to serve and share. For a heaven not upbuilt by the free and harmonious effort of many sons and servants of Good Will would be no heaven: and with no such work to do and cause to serve, neither Good Will, nor our wills a sharers of it, would have worth or meaning. For, as the idealists tell us, to be or to exist at all means to fulfil purpose; and a purpose that makes the present life noble, and requires eternity for its fulfilment, is the pledge and prophecy of a blessed immortality.

In addition to the idealistic evidence that immortality in Good Will is the only satisfactory fulfilment of the world-purpose, there is the pragmatic evidence that whoever hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as Good Will is pure. One cannot cherish the anticipation of an eternal life of perfect Good Will, and at the same time cherish malice and pride and cruelty and greed and sloth.

This faith makes judgment automatic and inexorable. In the clear transparency of the spiritual world those who have Good Will are forever welcome to its fellowship: those who have the lurking grudge, the mean jealousy, the hollow insincerity, are automatically shut out.

Pictorial representations of this automatic judgment by Good Will, are found at the end of Plato's "Gorgias," and in Jesus' parable of the Last Judgment. Phillips Brooks' sermon on "The Law of Liberty" also states it beautifully and convincingly.

"By this law we shall be judged. How simple and sublime it makes the judgment day! We stand before the great white throne and wait our verdict. We watch the closed lips of the Eternal Judge, and our hearts stand still until those lips shall open and pronounce our fate; heaven or hell. The lips do not open. The Judge just lifts His hand and raises from each soul before Him every law of constraint whose pressure has been its education. He lifts the laws of constraint and their results are manifest. The real intrinsic nature of each soul leaps to the surface. Each soul's law of liberty becomes supreme. And each soul, without one word of condemnation or approval, by its own inner tendency, seeks its own place. They turn and separate, father from child, brother from brother, wife from husband, each with the old habitual restrictions lifted off, turns to its own; one by an inner power to the right hand, another by a like power to the left; these up to heaven, and these down to hell. Do we need more? It needs no word, no smile, no frown. The freeing of souls is the judging of souls. A liberated nature dictates its own destiny."

A partial foretaste of this final judgment those who live in Good Will achieve here and now, in the spiritual discernment with which they joyfully recognize and are recognized by a kindred Good Will in those of their fellows who have it: and perceive and pity the absence of it, and consequently the impossibility of spiritual fellowship, in those who have it not.

GOOD WILL IN SOCIETY: REFORM

"We all love power — to be on the winning side. You cannot help being there when you are fighting the slum, for it is the cause of justice and right. How then can you lose? And what matters it how you fare, your cause is bound to win. Every defeat in such a fight is a step towards victory, taken in the right spirit. In the end you will come out ahead. With a mother who prays, a wife who fills the house with song, and the laughter of happy children about me, all my dreams come true or coming true, why should I not be content? In fact I know no better equipment for making them come true: faith in God to make all things possible that are right: faith in man to get them done: fun enough in between to keep them from spoiling or running off the track into useless crankery. An extra good sprinkling of that!" JACOB A. RUIS, The Making of an American, pp. 424-425: 431-432.

WITH these passages from the "Making of an American" for our text, we will go to the same happy warrior's "The Battle with the Slum" for our lesson.

"The battle with the slum began the day civilization recognized in it her enemy. It was a losing fight until conscience joined forces with fear and self-interest against

it. When common sense and the golden rule obtain among men as a rule of practice, it will be over.

“The slum complaint had been chronic in all ages, but the great changes which the nineteenth century saw, the new industry, political freedom, brought on an acute attack which put that very freedom in jeopardy. Too many of us had supposed that, built as our commonwealth was on universal suffrage, it would be proof against the complaints that harassed older states; but in fact it turned out that there was extra hazard in that. Having solemnly resolved that all men are created equal and have certain inalienable rights, among them life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, we shut our eyes and waited for the formula to work. It was as if a man with a cold should take the doctor's prescription to bed with him, expecting it to cure him. The formula was all right, but merely repeating it worked no cure. When, after a hundred years, we opened our eyes, it was upon sixty cents a day as the living wage of the working-woman in our cities; upon ‘knee pants’ at forty cents a dozen for the making; upon the Potter's Field taking tithe of our city life, ten per cent each year for the trench, truly the Lost Tenth of the slum. Our country had grown great and rich; through our ports was poured food for the millions of Europe. But in the back streets multitudes huddled in ignorance and want. The foreign oppressor had been vanquished, the fetters stricken from the black man at home; but his white brother, in his bitter plight, sent up a cry of distress that had in it a distinct note of menace. Political freedom we had won; but the problem of helpless poverty, grown vast with the added offscourings of the Old World, mocked us, unsolved. Liberty at sixty cents a day set presently its stamp upon the government of our cities, and it became the scandal and the peril of our political system.

"Slow work, yes! but be it ever so slow, the battle has got to be fought, and fought out. For it is one thing or the other; either we wipe out the slum, or it wipes out us. Let there be no mistake about this. It cannot be shirked. Shirking means surrender, and surrender means the end of government by the people. We are brothers whether we own it or not, and when the brotherhood is denied in Mulberry Street we shall look vainly for the virtue of good citizenship on Fifth Avenue.

"In the battle with the slums we win or we perish. There is no middle way. We shall win, for we are not letting things be the way our fathers did. But it will be a running fight, and it is not going to be won in two years, or in ten, or in twenty. For all that, we must keep on fighting, content if in our time we avert the punishment that waits upon the third and the fourth generation of those who forget the brotherhood. As a man does in dealing with his brother so it is the way of God that his children shall reap."

The slum is simply society's diseased tissue at its most inflamed point. What Mr. Riis says of it is true of the whole long list of political, economic, social, and moral and international reforms.

Society is imperfect. It is never a complete expression of Good Will. It is the resultant of Good Will on the one side, and of resisting matter and hard human hearts on the other. There are usually two sides to a social question; and some truth on each side. There are two ways of taking each side: one that is right and one that is wrong. Ordinarily it is not the preacher's business to tell his people which side of a debatable social question they shall take: but to show them how to take whichever side they join in the right and not in the wrong way.

For instance the preacher ought not to tell his people whether to vote the Republican or the Democratic ticket. If he attempts to do so he will antagonize good people in his congregation who honestly differ from him: and to that extent forfeit and deserve to forfeit his influence over them for more important issues. He ought to draw a sharp line, not between Republicans and Democrats ; but between Christian Republicans and heathen Republicans ; between Christian Democrats and heathen Democrats.

Who then is a Christian Republican? and who is a heathen Republican? Who is a Christian Democrat, and who is a heathen Democrat?

A Christian Republican is a man who believes that Good Will calls for a strong centralized government, in which the power of the whole is made effective for the benefit of each part : in which the profit of the individual and the prejudice of the locality is sacrificed to the interest of all and the judgment of the nation. He is willing to pay a higher tariff to keep in employment workingmen in whom he has no direct interest ; he is glad to pay a bigger tax to have forests conserved, deserts irrigated, rivers and harbors dredged, hundreds of miles from his home ; to have scientific researches prosecuted ; explorations made ; foreign policies maintained, and the military and naval power requisite for their support developed. The Christian Republican desires the nation to do all the Good Will it can ; even at the expense of his private, local interests as a consumer of a particular commodity ; as a dweller in this or that town or state ; as a member of this or that profession or vocation. To make Republicans Christian Republicans — Republicans who desire the nation to express all the Good Will it can, at whatever cost of taxation ; at whatever risk of corruption centralized power inevitably invites : believing the beneficence on the whole outweighs the corruption ; and the good of the whole is greater than the cost to its constituent parts : — that is the preacher's duty to his Republican parishioners.

On the other hand, if there is in his congregation a Republican who, just because he happens to be a manufacturer of woollen or tin goods, does not care how much more his fellow-citizens have to pay for their coats and dinner pails, so long as that increase comes to him and his locality and his business in extra profits ; who is a Republican for the sake of Republican office or Republican graft ; it is the business of the preacher to make him ashamed of himself : to show him that as such a Republican he can have no part or lot in Good Will for his country ; and brand him as the parasite and traitor that he is.

The Christian preacher likewise will try to make his Democratic parishioners Christian Democrats : Democrats, that is, who stand for the principle that the locality, the special interest, the individual should be let alone as much as possible; that the individual can make a better use of his money and manage his local affairs better than a central government can manage them for him; and that a sturdy independence is better for all concerned, and therefore for the nation as a whole, than a nursed, coddled and fostered prosperity provided and controlled by governmental agency.

Bad Democrats, on the other hand: Democrats who care not how the working-man must reduce his standard of living, or even go hungry, if only they buy their goods cheap; Democrats who are indifferent to the destruction of our forests, the obstruction of river and harbor traffic, the decline of efficiency in army and navy, so long as taxes are low: Democrats who are in politics for their pockets rather than their principles: — these the preacher will rebuke in the same searching and merciless way as he does their Republican counterparts, as traitors to their country and enemies of Good Will.

If this is the attitude of the preacher toward the two great parties, what shall it be toward parties that spring up in support of moral issues, like the Progressives and the Prohibitionists? Precisely the same. There are Christian Progressives and unchristian Progressives; Christian Prohibitionists and unchristian Prohibitionists. The Christian Progressive sees the political machines of both old parties grinding and crushing the people they were created to serve; captured and corrupted by powerful vested interests: and he stands for the restoration of power to the people; and the recapture in their interest of both governmental and party machinery. The Progressive with this programme is a Christian: and the preacher will honor and encourage him as a man who stands for important aspects of Good Will which in the strife of the regular parties, and by corrupt alliance among the leaders of both of them, had come to be neglected.

The unchristian Progressives, the disgruntled office-seekers who hope for personal advancement in a new party, the unpractical visionaries, the temperamental agitators, who fasten themselves upon every new movement, the preacher will condemn as useless and mischievous disturbers of the peace.

The Christian Prohibitionist likewise; the man who sees clearly and feels deeply the misery and degradation and corruption the sale of liquor carries in its train; and who believes that for the moment the pushing of the fight against this evil is more important than the support of the great domestic and foreign policies for which the regular parties stand:—the Christian Prohibitionist should be honored and upheld. The unchristian Prohi-bitionist; the man who sees only one issue at a time, and sees that red and reckless; the denunciatory Prohibitionist, the ascetic Prohibitionist, the self-exalting Prohibitionist, the Christian minister, with such gentleness and humor as he can command, will criticise and expose.

The Christian preacher, whatever he may do as citizen outside the pulpit, will not, as preacher, be a partisan of any party: he will not preach Republican, or Democratic, or Progressive, or Prohibitionist doctrine. He will be a partisan of Good Will in all these parties, and the foe to whatever in any of them opposes it. He will hold the Gospel of Good Will so precious, that he will not risk his influence for that by antagonizing in the pulpit honest beliefs of his people on minor matters of detail.

Before we can see the preacher's duty toward industrial problems and parties we must call to mind the present stage of industrial development.

As long as life was simple, as long as every man was half farmer, half jack-at-all-trades, as long as business consisted chiefly in the exchange of goods and services between individuals who were approximately equal, if not in wealth, at least in opportunity, individual justice, justice between man and man, was all the justice needed. Now that many essential services, like transportation, light, water, communication, have become monopolies ; and most of the rest through concentration of capital and mutual understandings have acquired many of the attributes of virtual monopoly, the individual in buying these commodities and services, and in selling his own services and products, is no longer on an approximate equality with the public service corporation or even the private corporation ; but largely at its mercy. But the mercy of a corporation is proverbially lacking. A corporation, left to itself, becomes a mere machine for declaring dividends ; with both mercy and justice, to say the least, not in the focus, but at best on the dim periphery of its attention.

Since the corporation ordinarily cannot be made disinterestedly and directly expressive of Good Will, it becomes necessary for some commission, or board of control, to be placed over it to compel it to conform not merely to the letter of the law, but to the spirit of Good Will. Such commissions or boards have as their function the enforcement of the rights of patrons and employees ; the prevention of violation of the spirit as well as the letter of the law ; and the definition of the terms and applications of the law when they are uncertain or in dispute.

The object of these laws and commissions is to lift the plane of competition where there is competition ; and to restrain the power of monopoly where there is monopoly. Protection against the exploitation of child labor : restriction of the hours and the conditions of the labor of women and children : provision for working-men's compensation in case of accident, so that the cost of such accidents shall not fall on the poor working-man or his family, but shall be distributed among the consumers of the product as part of its just price : working-men's insurance at moderate rates, with state protection and support, instead of the exorbitant terms and tricky policies which uncontrolled private companies have imposed : — these are some of the more urgent reforms Good Will has been demanding and will continue to demand in the immediate future.

Welfare work ; rest rooms ; provision for luncheon at moderate cost ; recreation and social opportunities for employees are other forms Good Will takes when it enters the heart of a powerful individual or corporation and controls its attitude toward employees. Recognition of labor unions ; readiness to deal with them ; a grateful sense of whatever help they can give their employees toward just wages and wholesome hours and conditions of work is another sign that Good Will toward the employees is present in the heart of the employer.

When possible on an open, fair and honest basis, profit-sharing is the crowning consummation of Good Will under the competitive system of production and distribution. When capitalist, entrepreneur and working-man, each and all have a share proportioned to their contribution to the profits of their joint enterprise; then we have as much Good Will in industry as present conditions permit, and the immediate future promises as practically possible.

When Good Will in business has achieved public control of the plane of competition, arbitration, welfare work, profit-sharing, working-men's participation in management, there will doubtless develop the need of further safeguards and firmer coöperation; and these may involve steps still further in the direction of socialism. When they prove their beneficence and practicality Good Will in men and society will adopt them. But for the present and the immediate future those who have this Good Will must be careful not to let go the values of independence, initiative, and resourcefulness in the competitive system, before they are sure of greater gains from socialistic experiments.

Individualism aims to give each man all the liberty consistent with the like liberty for everybody else. But there are two fatal indictments against uncontrolled individualism under modern conditions. First: liberty is not an end but a means; and when set up as an end amounts only to an empty abstraction: good as a war-cry in times of revolution against tyranny, but entirely incapable of producing a satisfactory mode of life. We need freedom not from tyranny only but in participation in a common good; and of this freedom in a common good individualism gives the mere form without the substance.

Second: the liberty individualism offers, however it might work out between equals, when applied to parties grossly unequal inevitably results in the enslavement of the weaker by the stronger. The liberty offered by individualism turns out to be no liberty at all: for to the weaker party it presents the alternative:—“Accept the terms offered by the stronger, or starve on terms satisfactory to yourself”:—which is practically no alternative at all.

Socialism is weak in just the opposite way. Individualism provides goods and services; but at cruel cost to the exploited laborers. Socialism promises to take excellent care of the laborer; so good care in fact that the individualistic motive to enterprise and thrift would be greatly in danger of becoming relaxed. But where are the goods and services coming from if the nerve of individual responsibility is cut?

The post-office is cited as an example of collectivist efficiency. Yet the efficiency of the post-office comes through men trained under the régime of competition. As long as the momentum of individualistic initiative lasted, socialism would work ; but that would not be for long. Socialism in its more extreme form is conceivable only as the first stage in a process of economic degradation ; the brief stage namely during which the momentum acquired under individualism would last. Individualism gives us magnificently efficient and economical production with grossly unjust and unequal distribution. Socialism offers us just and generous distribution, with enormously decreased and deteriorated products to distribute. One offers the empty heart and the full hands ; the other the full heart and the empty hands.

The preacher's duty is the same toward economic policies as toward politics. He must see and approve the good in individualism ; and see and condemn the evil in individualism. He must see and approve the good in socialism ; and see and condemn the evil in socialism. As preacher he can rarely venture to say at what precise moment and to what precise extent free contract shall end and government control begin ; government control end and government ownership begin. As preacher his task is to make free contract considerate ; knowing that considerate contract leads logically and emotionally to profit-sharing, welfare work or government control: to make government control impartial as between capitalist, consumer and employee; knowing that the logic of control of services, rates and wages drives inexorably in the direction of government ownership.

On the other hand, if ever, and so far as, government, ownership, or a control amounting to virtual ownership, is reached, it will become the urgent duty of the Christian preacher to preach with all his might the old individualistic virtues of economy, industry, diligence, initiative, enterprise: for when once the competitive motives to these individualistic virtues are withdrawn disinterested Christian benevolence will be the only safeguard against laziness, shiftlessness, stupidity, corruption, reaction, and retrogression. Under the individualistic régime, the phases of Good Will most needing to be preached are the socialistic virtues: under the socialistic régime the virtues most needing to be preached would be the individualistic virtues. But the Christian preacher should never become either the mere individualist or the mere socialist. His business is to help individualists to be Christian individualists, and in so doing he will carry them a long way toward socialism. His business is likewise to help socialists to be Christian socialists, and if he does that effectively he will hold them to the homely individual virtues which too many socialists sadly lack, and by lacking seriously discredit their cause.

Thus the Christian preacher's vocation is to serve both economic parties; and is equally important whichever of the two happens to be uppermost. At the same time since he preaches not what men like but what they need; and men always need most the qualities, not of the order under which they are living and which are enforced by that order, but the qualities of the order under which they are not living and but for the preacher would be unenforced, the preacher's message on these subjects in neither case can be altogether popular.

The wise minister will not preach directly for or against woman's suffrage. He will scorn to withhold from woman anything that would add to her dignity and power which she reasonably and earnestly desires. At the same time he will so magnify her contributions as wife, mother, comrade, friend, hostess and teacher, that her possible service as voter will be seen to be a very minor fraction of her total service to society.

If in politics and labor problems the preacher must see and serve Good Will on both sides of controverted questions, in the family may he not take sides, and lay down the law for society to follow? Many preachers so assume; and many laymen acquiesce. But here again his highest usefulness lies not in hot partisanship nor cold neutrality; but in helpful service to the needs of both parties.

Divorce is of course the burning issue respecting the family. The Christian preacher as the exponent of Good Will holds up as the ideal for every normal man and woman indissoluble monogamous marriage. Mankind's prolonged experiment in living has proved that for the normal individual in a normal society such marriage is happiest, holiest and best for all concerned. The whole trend and tendency of the Christian minister's teaching and preaching will make for such permanent and fruitful union. He will include the promise of such a union in the marriage ceremony. He will counsel patience and forbearance when married men and women seek his advice in times of strain. He will train young men and women to regard marriage as a lifelong obligation to be fulfilled at cost of serious sacrifice. He will refuse to remarry persons who in selfishness and petulance, restlessness or infatuation, have been divorced. For the sake of the priceless blessings lifelong devotion brings to husband and wife, to parents and children, to family and society, he will urge men and women to pay the high price that devotion frequently costs when the other party is poor, or sick, or irritable, or unreasonable. On no lower or easier terms can Good Will for the family be proclaimed.

Yet when the pearls of a pure affection are persistently trampled under the feet of swinish greed, lust, and hatefulness; when through no fault of the innocent party life for him or her is made intolerable with no prospect of benefit or blessing to the guilty one; then the Christian minister will recognize what most Christian states already allow—the right of the innocent party to divorce and remarriage. The true marriage is so much more blessed than any other mode of life that it does not need to be bolstered up by the enforced continuity of marriages which are perverted into loathsome sensuality, hideous hate, intolerable wretchedness. The Christian preacher should have so much sympathy for the unhappy victims of bad marriages, and so much respect for the blessedness of good marriages, that he will recognize and approve the desire to escape the bondage and degradation of such an unchristian union. He will not in a spirit of formal literalism ask whether the guilty party has committed the one specific sin which Jesus happened to mention as a legitimate ground of divorce. He will ask in a broad, sympathetic, common-sense spirit whether

Good Will for the individuals concerned and for society calls them to continue to pay this heavy price or not. If in his best judgment it does not, he will sanction divorce; admit the innocent divorced person to the fullest Christian fellowship; and even perform the marriage ceremony where there is the promise and prospect of a new and happy lifelong marriage. To do less than that would be to miss the spirit of Good Will, through being a stickler for the precise letter in which its general conditions were declared by Jesus and embodied in the Holy Scriptures — an attitude which is unworthy of the free and friendly preacher of Good Will.

If politics, economics and the family are to be treated by the preacher indirectly through principles rather than directly in detail, surely distinctly moral problems like the brothel, the saloon, and the gambling den are spheres in which the preacher may advocate specific social programmes. Not on questions where there is honest and earnest difference of opinion between men of equal Good Will; at least not unless he gives full and generous acknowledgment to the earnest and honest Good Will of his opponents. Even here he will be most effective as preacher, whatever he may do in his capacity as an individual citizen, if he confines his preaching for the most part to principles; and leaves to the mayor, the police, good government clubs and the voters the specific measures in which his principles shall be embodied.

Concerning the social evil it is his province to make men see and feel and reverence the beauty and beneficence of Nature's provision for the reproduction and improvement of the human race through the selection of the best in each of two individuals brought together by the mighty attraction of sex. The holiness of pure love he will teach them to revere as God's choicest gift. On the background of such a reverence he will throw the beastliness of the lust that would pollute and pervert it in selfish and irresponsible sensuality; so that every man who hears his message will be ashamed to treat any woman with anything less than chivalry. On this background he will throw the odiousness and cruelty of the greed that destroys and sells the bodies and souls of women for the gratification of the lusts of brutal men. The preacher will make the whole sordid and loathsome traffic to appear the cruel, monstrous, degrading contradiction of Good Will it is. Having created and kept alive that sentiment his work as preacher is done: and if that is faithfully, fearlessly and effectively done, the proper legislative, executive, and police measures will allow in proportion to the political, business and social influence his congregation has in the community; and the minister will be more not less a power, than if as a preacher he were to attempt to say whether this or that specific regulation shall be adopted. The Christian ministry always has been and always will be the most potent foe of this unspeakable iniquity: and in the future as in the past the preacher's main contribution will be sentiment aroused by principles, rather than legislation applied or misapplied in details.

The same is true of intemperance. The horror and beastliness of it; the cruelty to wife and children; the injury to society and posterity will be a frequent theme with the preacher whose people are subject to that temptation. He will unsparingly denounce the meanness and infamy of men who make a sordid living by catering to the vices of the weak, and impoverishing their wretched families. If this is temperately, faithfully and fearlessly done, political action in restriction of the liquor traffic will follow: and follow all the more surely and effectively than it would were the preacher to attempt to tell his people to vote to put prohibition into the state or national constitution before there is sentiment to enforce it in the villages and cities of which the state and nation are composed. As a citizen the preacher may make stump speeches if he please; but the pulpit is not the place, nor the hour of Sabbath worship the time, to advocate state-wide statutes, or amendments to the constitution of the country. Important as those things are, the preacher has larger and less divisive issues: issues, too, on which he is or ought to be more of an expert than he usually can be in constitutional amendments, statutes and police regulations.

The same principle governs the minister's attitude toward international affairs. He will instil into the minds of his people the horror, the futility, the waste, the wickedness of all war that is honorably avoidable. He will point out the infinitely superior economy and efficiency of arbitration where that is practicable. He will labor to build up a sentiment which will unite the nations in a league of peace.

Yet he will recognize that, to say nothing of barbarous tribes, even nominally Christian nations are not yet actually Christian in their policies toward other nations.

Whenever self-defence against wanton and arrogant aggression demands it, whenever weak nations for which we have by treaty or proximity special national obligations need our protection against outward attack or protracted internal strife, wherever the maintenance of the laws and rights of nations against their unscrupulous and deliberate disregard requires it, then rightfully and firmly he will call upon his nation, as he would an individual in similar situation, to take up arms; not in malice, not for aggrandizement or glory, but as a costly sacrifice essential to the doing by the nation of its part in the service of Good Will.

Peace-making and peace-loving as every minister of Christ must be, he will advocate such sufficient preparedness for war at all times as will reduce to a minimum the necessity for actual war; and make the nation's voice effective in behalf of international justice. Bitterly as he opposes militarism he will advocate so much military strength in his own nation as is necessary to protect both his own nation and the world from domination by those nations in which it is enthroned.

On all these matters, and a host of others, child labor, the juvenile court, prison reform, charity administration, rural betterment, civil service reform, arbitration of industrial disputes, the minister may not be unintelligent or indifferent: neither can he wisely be dictatorial in detail. To create and sustain sound convictions and lively sentiment is his mighty province, a province so mighty that he makes a fearful mistake when he forfeits his authority and influence within it to contend over the debatable details of their application. Not of course that details and applications are unimportant; or that principles and sentiment amount to anything unless they are applied in detail. But in the intricate and delicate team-work of society, principles and sentiments are the Christian minister's specific assignment: while application in detail through legislation and administration are not. Let the minister stick to his assignment; and urge the other social agencies to be faithful to theirs: and through the united efforts of clergy and laity, preacher and citizens, Good Will is sure to be done more effectively than if ministers seek to legislate and enforce; while the citizens are left hazy about spiritual principles, and spiritless in moral sentiment.

This team-work view of the minister's relation to social problems is at present far less popular than the individual-star view, which measures the minister by what he can accomplish directly, and set down to his individual credit. But the sacrifice of individual credit for speedy and showy specific results is the price one has to pay everywhere for the greater ultimate efficiency of team-work.

To this principle there are of course exceptions in times of acute crises; when the minister happens to be at the same time an expert in politics, or economics, or social reform; or when no layman or group of laymen can be induced to take the lead in application of Christian principles to crying social needs and wrongs. Then the minister may be forgiven if he temporarily leaves the ministry of the word to serve tables; if he neglects the cultivation of sound convictions and earnest sentiments in others to become himself on his own account a leader in a Republican, or Democratic, or Progressive, or Prohibition campaign; or to take sides in a lockout or strike; or to close this or that specific saloon.

Of course all that has been said about the minister as minister in the pulpit, and in his pastoral relations, does not interfere with the minister's doing his part as a citizen side by side with his fellow-citizens of his own and other parishes in direct political, economic, moral and social reform.

Mr. Riis was offered repeatedly political offices in which to carry on his fight against the slum. But he invariably declined with the remark that he could do most by sticking to his last as a reporter.

Unless he be an exceptional man in exceptional circumstances the preacher will do best to follow his example. Direct activity in specific measures of reform is not a burden to be laid on the shoulders of every preacher: and it is grossly unfair to judge the ministry by such an expectation. If he is fitted to be a preacher at all his chief efficiency will come through the convictions and sentiments he imparts and quickens in the men and women to whom he ministers.

FELLOWSHIP IN GOOD WILL: THE CHURCH

"The new Church Universal, then, would be the militant, aggressive body of the reborn, whose mission it was to send out into the life of the nation transformed men and women who would labor unremittingly for the Kingdom of God. The supreme function of the church was to inspire — to inspire individuals to willing service for the cause, the Cause of Democracy, the fellowship of mankind." WINSTON CHURCHILL, The Inside of the Cup, p. 366.

THE book from which our final text and lesson is taken strikes simultaneously two notes: service of the fellowship of mankind, and intellectual honesty. The former is our theme. A generation ago the latter was the burning issue. It is important still. Good Will has no affinity with falsehood. Yet that is not the burning question to-day. A man, as the result of early training and environment, may hold views about such matters as the virgin birth which critical, scientific history finds it impossible to accept: and at the same time be a devoted and accepted servant of Good Will, a man the latchet of whose shoes the critical, scientific historian is not worthy to unloose. And on the contrary a man may be scientifically correct in his views about these matters, and still be at the farthest remove from that Good Will in which vital Christianity consists.

Our lesson from this book is in two parts: the first, negative and specific, showing precisely what the true Church and its members cannot be — selfish plunderers of their fellows under respectable disguise: the second positive but abstract, showing the attitude toward life the Church and its members must take: and that for this attitude there can be no dogmatic, traditional, or ritualistic substitute.

The first part, the description of what the church cannot be and cannot tolerate in its members without its own stultification is put into the mouth of a workingman, Garvin, who has lost his fortune, and is in danger of losing his child, as the result of the dishonest dealings of the prominent churchman, Eldon Parr.

“Well, I was a Traction sucker, all right, and I guess you wouldn’t have to walk more than two blocks to find another in this neighborhood. You think Eldon Parr’s a big, noble man, don’t you? You’re proud to run his church, ain’t you? You wouldn’t believe there was a time when I thought he was a big man, when I was kind of proud to live in the same city with him. She’ll tell you how I used to come home from the store and talk about him after supper, and hope that the kid there would grow up into a financier like Eldon Parr. The boys at the store talked about him : he sort of laid hold on our imaginations with the library he gave, and Elmwood Park, and the picture of the big organ in your church in the newspapers — and sometimes, Mary and me and the boy, in the baby carriage, on Sunday afternoons we used to walk around by his house, just to look at it. You couldn't have got me to believe that Eldon Parr would put his name to anything that wasn't straight.

“Then Consolidated Traction came along, with Parr's name behind it. Everybody was talking about it, and how it was payin' eight per cent. from the start, and extra dividends and all, and what a marvel of finance it was. Before the kid came, as soon as I married her, we began to save up for him. We didn't go to the theaters or nothing. Well, I put it all, five thousand dollars, into Consolidated. She'll tell you how we sat up half the night after we got the first dividend talking about how we'd send the kid to college, and after we went to bed we couldn't sleep. It wasn't more than a year after that we began to hear things — and we couldn't sleep for sure, and the dividends stopped and the stock tumbled. Even then I wouldn't believe it of him, that he'd take poor people's money that way when he had more than he knew what to do with. I made up my mind if I went down to see him and told him about it, he'd make it right. I asked the boss for an hour off, and headed for the Parr building — I've been there as much as fifty times since — but he don't bother with small fry. The clerks laugh when they see me coming. I got sick worryin', and when I was strong enough to be around they'd filled my job at the grocery, and it wasn't long before we had to move out of our little home in Alder Street. We've been movin' ever since,' he cried, and tears of weakness were in his eyes, 'until we've come to this, and we'll have to get out of here in another week. God knows where we'll go then.

“Then I found out how he done it — from a lawyer. The lawyer laughed at me, too. Say, do you wonder I ain't got much use for your church people? Parr got a corporation lawyer named Langmaid — he's another one of your millionaire crooks — to fix it up and get around the law and keep him out of jail. And then they had to settle with Tom Beatty for something like three hundred thousand. You know who Beatty is — he owns this city — his saloon's around here on Elm Street. All the crooks had to be squared. Say,' he demanded aggressively, 'are Parr and Langmaid any better than

Beatty, or any of the hold-up men Beatty covers? There's a street-walker over there in those flats that's got a million times more chance to get to heaven — if there is any — than those financiers, as they call 'em-selves! I ain't much on high finance, but I've got some respect for a second story man now — he takes some risks! I'll tell you what they did, they bought up the short car lines that didn't pay and sold 'em to themselves for fifty times as much as they were worth; and they got controlling interests in the big lines and leased 'em to themselves with dividends guaranteed as high as eighteen per cent. They capitalized the Consolidated for more millions than a little man like me can think of, and we handed 'em our money because we thought they were honest. We thought the men who listed the stock on the Exchange were honest. And when the crash came, they'd got away with the swag, like any common housebreakers. There were dummy directors, and a dummy president. Eldon Parr didn't have a share — sold out everything when she went over two hundred, but you bet he kept his stock in the leased lines, which guarantee more than they earn. He cleaned up five million, they say. . . . My money — the money that might give that boy fresh air, and good doctors. . . Say, you believe in hell, don't you? You tell Eldon Parr to keep his charity, — he can't send any of it here. And you'd better go back to that church of his and pray to keep his soul out of hell."

As I have said the second part is more abstract. It isn't so easy to draw worthily the individual saint as it is the individual sinner: for the sinner is small, with sharp outlines and clear-cut angles; while the man who lives in Good Will is large, symmetrical, well rounded, and therefore a difficult subject for a striking portrait. Even in abstract description, however, the true church and churchman tower above the mean manipulator of securities, the donor of parks, playgrounds, libraries and settlement houses with money wrung from the plunder of the poor. I cite his long attempt to describe the true church, as a vague feeling after rather than a definite finding of the church as the fellowship of Good Will.

"He began by referring to the hope with which he had come to St. John's and the gradual realization that the church was a failure — a dismal failure when compared to the high ideal of her Master. By her fruits she should be known and judged. From the first he had contemplated, with a heavy heart, the sin and misery at their very gates. Not three blocks distant children were learning vice in the streets, little boys of seven and eight, underfed and anæmic, were driven out before dawn to sell newspapers, little girls thrust forth to haunt the saloons and beg, while their own children were warmed and fed. While their own daughters were guarded, young women in Dalton Street were forced to sell themselves into a life which meant slow torture, inevitable early death. Hopeless husbands and wives were cast up like driftwood by the cruel, resistless flood of modern civilization — the very civilization which yielded their wealth and luxury; the civilization which professed the Spirit of Christ, and yet was pitiless.

“He confessed to them that for a long time he had been blind to the truth, had taken the inherited, unchristian view that the disease which caused vice and poverty might not be cured, though its ulcers might be alleviated. He had not, indeed, clearly perceived and recognized the disease. He had regarded Dalton Street in a very special sense as a reproach to St. John’s, but now he saw that all such neighborhoods were in reality a reproach to the city, to the state, to the nation. True Christianity and Democracy were identical, and the congregation of St. John’s, as professed Christians and citizens, were doubly responsible, inasmuch as they not only made no protest or attempt to change a government which permitted the Dalton Streets to exist, but inasmuch also as, — directly or indirectly, — they derived a profit from conditions which were an abomination to God. It would be but an idle mockery for them to go and build a settlement house, if they did not first reform their lives.

“When he, their rector, had gone to Dalton Street to invite the poor and wretched into God’s Church, he was met by the scornful question: ‘Are the Christians of the churches any better than we? Christians own the grim tenements in which we live, the saloons and brothels by which we are surrounded, which devour our children. Christians own the establishments which pay us starvation wages; profit by politics, and take toll from our very vice; evade the laws and reap millions, while we are sent to jail. Is their God a God who will lift us out of our misery and distress? Are their churches for the poor? Are not the very pews in which they sit as closed to us as their houses?’

“One inevitable conclusion of such a revelation was that he had not preached to them the vital element of Christianity. And the very fact that his presentation of religion had left many indifferent or dissatisfied was proof positive that he had dwelt upon non-essentials, laid emphasis upon the mistaken interpretations of past ages. There were those within the Church who were content with this, who — like the Pharisees of old — welcomed a religion which did not interfere with their complacency, with their pursuit of pleasure and wealth, with their special privileges; welcomed a church which didn't raise her voice against the manner of their lives — against the order, the Golden Calf which they had set up, which did not accuse them of deliberately retarding the coming of the Kingdom of God.

“ Ah, that religion was not religion, for religion was a spiritual, not a material affair. In that religion, vainly designed by man as a compromise between God and Mammon, there was none of the divine discontent of the true religion of the Spirit, no need of the rebirth of the soul. And those who held it might well demand, with Nicodemus and the rulers of the earth, ‘How can these things be?’

“ Truth might no longer be identified with Tradition, and the day was past when councils and synods might determine it for all mankind. The era of forced acceptance of philosophical doctrines and dogmas was past, and that of freedom, of spiritual rebirth, of vicarious suffering, of willing sacrifice and service for a Cause was upon them. That cause was Democracy. Christ was uniquely the Son of God because he had lived and suffered and died in order to reveal to the world the meaning of this life and of the hereafter — the meaning not only for the individual, but for society as well. Nothing might be added to or subtracted from that message — it was complete.

“True faith was simply trusting — trusting that Christ gave to the world the revelation of God’s plan. And the Savior himself had pointed out the proof: ‘If any man do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak for myself.’ Christ had repeatedly rebuked those literal minds which had demanded material evidence: true faith spurned it, just as true friendship, true love between man and man, true trust scorned a written bond. To paraphrase St. James’ words, faith without trust is dead — because faith without trust is impossible. God is a Spirit, only to be recognized in the Spirit, and every one of the Savior’s utterances were — not of the flesh, of the man — but of the Spirit within him. ‘He that hath seen me hath seen the Father’; and ‘Why callest thou me good? none is good save one, that is God’; the Spirit, the Universal Meaning of Life, incarnate in the human Jesus.

“To be born again was to overcome our spiritual blindness, and then, and then only, we might behold the Spirit shining in the soul of Christ.

“The secret, then, lay in a presentation of the divine message which would convince and transform and electrify those who heard it to action — a presentation of the message in terms which the age could grasp.

“No man might venture to predict the details of the future organization of the united Church, although St. Paul himself had sketched it in broad outline: every worker, lay and clerical, labouring according to his gift, teachers, executives, ministers, visitors, missionaries, healers of sick and despondent souls. But the supreme function of the Church was to inspire — to inspire individuals to willing service for the cause, the cause of Democracy, the fellowship of mankind. If she failed to inspire, the Church would wither and perish. And therefore she must revive again the race of inspirers, prophets, modern Apostles to whom this gift was given, going on their rounds, awaking cities and arousing whole country-sides.

“But whence — it might be demanded by the cynical — were the prophets to come? Prophets could not be produced by training and education; prophets must be born. Reborn, — that was the word. Let the Church have faith. Once her Cause were perceived, once her whole energy were directed towards its fulfilment, the prophets would arise. out of the East and out of the West, to stir mankind to higher effort, to denounce fearlessly the shortcomings and evils of the age. They had not failed in past ages, when the world had fallen into hopelessness, indifference and darkness. And they would not fail now.

“The meaning of life, then, was service, and by life our Lord did not mean mere human existence, which is only a part of life. The Kingdom of heaven is a state, and may begin here. And that which we saw around us was only one expression of that eternal life — a medium to work through, towards God. All was service, both here and hereafter, and he that had not discovered that the joy of service was the only happiness worth living for could have no conception of the Kingdom. To those who knew, there was no happiness like being able to say, ‘I have found my place in God’s plan, I am of use.’ Such was salvation.”

The essential contrast between the church of Eldon Parr and the new Church Universal, as here set forth, is the contrast between a church composed of plunderers of the weak and poor, and a church devoted to the service of the Good Will which includes and cares for the humblest and most defenceless of our brothers and sisters.

In preceding chapters we have said nothing about the Church, the Bible, the Sabbath, the Sacraments, public worship, prayer, missions, or the ministry as a consecrated order. Without any of these aids Good Will may be done, the Kingdom may come, through the obedience of individuals and their informal coöperation with each other. Not until we recognize this fact can we appreciate the real mission and true value of these agencies. They have no magical virtue or mysterious efficacy in and of themselves; and the claim that they have brings them into deserved disrepute. Apart from them all a man may live in and by and for Good Will; and if he does he is a Christian. To deny him that title, and to insist on something more as essential is to miss the whole point of the Gospel of Good Will. Whoever doeth that Will is brother and sister and mother of Christ; though he never enter a church, or open a Bible, or say a verbal prayer, or partake of the sacraments, or do or refrain from doing a single thing on Sunday which he would not do or refrain from doing on the other days of the week.

Still, while not essential as ends, all these things are precious means of keeping alive in one's own heart, and enkindling in the hearts of others, the love and service of Good Will. There is no other important interest or enthusiasm that attempts to dispense with organized association. Athletics, business, literature, history, art science, banking, engineering, manufacture, agriculture, education, labor, all have their clubs, associations, conferences, conventions, organized locally, nationally and many of them internationally. For the same reason men and women who enjoy Good Will desire to share it with each other; profit by each other's experience and insight; provide for its communication to their children, and its extension to those outside its fold. Worthless, positively mischievous, spiritually deadly, when set up as an end in itself, the church as a means of fellowship in Good Will is so natural, so useful, so necessary, that practically all who have that Will at heart, and see the church as the provision for its expression and propagation; unless prevented by some false attitude on its part, or some misunderstanding on their own part; will desire to share and support its worship and its work.

One of the preacher's most important tasks is to protect the church from the misconceptions which have arisen about it. When a convert asked Billy Sunday "Do I have to join the church?" he replied, "No, you don't have to take a steamer to go to Europe. The swimming is good." Neither the steamer nor the church is helped by attributing to it a magical value of its own: its value as an instrument to ends greater than itself is in each case ample justification. Joining the church is the normal and usual corollary of accepting Good Will as the support and guide of life. But to preach the church as the main proposition, is to obscure the great spiritual issues which it is its function to proclaim. To increase men's faith and obedience and trust in Good Will should be the preacher's single aim; and if that aim be genuine and effective, additions to membership in the visible organization which represents it will follow as warmth follows sunshine. But to aim at membership directly for its own sake, is like attempting to warm a room by breathing on the bulb of the thermometer.

Christian unity consists in community of Good Will: the sense of oneness of aim that binds together all who are striving for the common good. It tends toward church unity: yet is not dependent on it, and need not be postponed until church unity is realized.

In so far as racial, cultural, or temperamental differences call for different social, intellectual, and devotional expression Good Will welcomes and supports diversity in polity, doctrine and worship. In so far as economy and efficiency demand centralization, as they certainly do in rural regions, Good Will calls for church union, or at least church federation.

So long as denominational differences last, the member of a denominational church, if he is full of Good Will,

will have the feeling toward his denomination that a soldier has toward his particular company:—something a little more intimate than his feeling for the army, yet entirely subordinate to that. He will expect the soldiers of other companies to be as loyal to their companies as he is to his: when the good of the service requires it he will readily transfer his membership to another company, and welcome men from other companies to his own: cherishing as the deepest bond of unity loyalty to the army as a whole of which the several companies are merely constituent parts. Good Will is inclusive, not divisive; and in due time will develop the outward unity all its children so eagerly desire.

The Bible is not infallible; not everything in it is scientific, historical, or even final moral truth. Good Will came into the world before the Bible; made the history the Bible records; lived the life the Bible portrays; and is as much bigger, stronger, richer than the Bible as facts are bigger than records; as deeds are stronger than words; as life is richer than letters.

The moment we see this, however, we begin to see how marvellous a help the Bible is to all who seek to live in Good Will. Once we get a vital, first-hand impulse to Good Will from a living person or group of persons, who are doing it; then the example, the teaching, the spirit of those who lived this life long ago, comes with an inspiration, an encouragement, an illumination which throws floods of light on the path Good Will now calls us to follow. The Bible is more helpful than the precepts and illustrations of modern doers of Good Will, because of the greater freshness and simplicity of characters and situations; because of the more thorough winnowing of essentials from non-essentials wrought by time and art. In these writings, not preserved by miracle from the incidental errors and limitations of the times in which they were composed, but cherished with reverent affection by three score generations of men, there is such a clearness of issue between Good Will and the evil forces that are opposed to it, that we get a sharpness of outline, a naïveté, which no later literature has been able to approach. The same spirit animates these writings that animates the words and deeds, the songs and speeches, the letters and discourses of Christian men to-day: but in them this spirit shines through a far more transparent medium, and is obstructed by less irrelevant detail. Furthermore the Bible contains the original records of the words and deeds, the life and death, of the great Master of Good Will, and the acts and writings of those who caught their inspiration from him at first hand.

A man can be a Christian without reading the Bible : he can be a much better one by reading it : and, other things being equal, the more he reads and reflects upon it the better Christian he will be. It is, and will remain forever, the supreme literature of Good Will. The unique supremacy of the Bible is best maintained by a frank and thorough criticism which abandons all false defences; admits all sorts of human blemishes; and in spite of them all; yes, on account of them all, sees there a transparent revelation of the glory of Good Will; which we more sophisticated moderns seem powerless to achieve. Put the Bible on its intrinsic merits; and it will fare better and rank higher than it ever has under the claims of a miraculous infallibility. A preacher who does not know his Bible as a mathematician knows his multiplication table; and who does not use its examples, its precepts, its phrases, as constantly, will miss his best material for illustration and inspiration.

The Sabbath likewise is a dreary end; a most useful and helpful means. It is the great opportunity to remember, reënforce and express Good Will. The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath, as Jesus emphatically declares.

Ordinarily there are better things than work or play for Sunday. Rest, change, simple social intercourse, neighborly helpfulness, reading, reflection, worship, prayer, are better for the individual and for society than a continuation of the labors and sports of the week days; and therefore Good Will invites to these Sabbath occupations all who seek its fullest fellowship in highest consecration. Not that work and play on that day are intrinsically and universally bad; or that the clerk or bookkeeper kept at his desk all the week should not have his game of golf or tennis on Sunday afternoon: but that friendliness and rest, meditation and worship are ordinarily better: — that is the general ground on which Good Will claims that these better things shall have first place in our plans for Sabbath observance. Because a worshipful Sunday is helpful to that individual and social well-being which is the object of Good Will; and a secular Sunday is injurious to individual and social well-being; therefore the highest type of Christian will aim as a rule to put worship into his Sunday plans and keep distraction out.

Friendship has its hand clasp: affection its kiss: all sorts of clubs, associations and fraternities have their initiations and banquets. In all these cases the things done are not essential; nor possessed of mysterious efficacy. They are outward and visible symbols of an inner loyalty and devotion. Yet few friends refuse to shake hands; few lovers dispense with the kiss; few fraternities or orders omit all rites and ceremonies.

The sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper bear a similar relation to fellowship in Good Will. Of themselves they are nothing; but taken in faith; in other words, regarded as seals, symbols and signs of our fellowship with Christ in Good Will, our gratitude and our devotion to him, they give a public confession, a social recognition, to this fellowship which make it at once more intimate and more objective. One can be a Christian without them; as a friend can be a friend without ever shaking hands; or as a lover can be a lover without ever kissing his beloved. But one can be a more assured; a more influential; a more sociable; a more substantial Christian by accepting and utilizing the symbols which reach across the seas and the centuries and link us to Christ, and to all who have received these symbols from him, or his appointed representatives.

Public worship is not essential to that Good Will in which Christianity consists. One can be a Christian without it. Yet if one is in earnest about Good Will; he will desire from time to time to call it consciously to mind; reconsecrate himself to its service; and share his enthusiasm for it with like-minded men and women. That is precisely the opportunity which public worship affords. The congregation and each individual is lifted into an attitude and atmosphere in which Good Will is held as the supreme object of reverence and service; the supreme guide to aspiration and conduct. One who habitually enters into this attitude and atmosphere will develop Good Will and express it toward others, far more effectively, systematically and persistently than one who depends on its fortuitous occurrence to his individual mind and heart. As the years, the decades, the generations pass, the man and the family that unites in public worship will become very different from the man and the family that do not reënforce the chance promptings of the heart by this systematic means. One can be so much better a Christian with than without such aid; that he who deliberately neglects it, choosing as he does less rather than more of the power of Good Will over his life, finds the little Christianity that he has fast slipping away from him; and spiritual bankruptcy staring him in the face.

Even verbal prayer likewise is not of the essence of Christianity. As Jesus repeatedly tells us, a man who does Good Will without ever consciously saying "Lord, Lord," is better far than the man who is explicitly prayerful but disobedient. To the men of silent obedience admission to the Kingdom may come as a great surprise to themselves; and a great shock to their orthodox critics; but we have Jesus' word and our own insight that it surely comes. Yet a man is very foolish who does not pray. As Arthur Balfour once said at the conclusion of a long and rather inconsequential discussion on prayer, "But to be at his best a man must pray." Prayer is a device for keeping our thoughts, our aims, our words, our acts, consciously under the guidance and control of Good Will. It is about as necessary to the best Christian living as contact with the wire is to an electric car. The car may move in the desired direction without such a contact; but its movement under such chance propulsion will be fitful, costly, insignificant, unreliable. A Christian conceivably might serve Good Will without praying; but his service would be intermittent and spasmodic. Whoever is deeply in earnest about Good Will, will be eager to keep it clear before his mind, warm in his heart, compelling behind his will; and prayer is the approved device for doing these things.

Prayer is not a blank check on omnipotence, by presenting which, properly endorsed, anybody can secure anything he happens to want, and is willing to ask for in that form. Petition is a proper part of prayer — even petition for specific things; just as petition is a perfectly proper part of the intercourse between friends; but it is not the principal part. A friend whose chief relation to us consisted in asking for this or that special favor or specific object, would not be one whose disinterested devotion we should rate very high; or even one whose friendship we should care to keep. Precisely so, if we have not risen above making prayer primarily a means to gaining this or that specific favor; we are not on very honorable terms with God and his Good Will. God is not mocked: and if we get little from such prayer, we get all we deserve. Prayer is primarily communion, fellowship; mind with mind; heart to heart; will with will. Incidentally it doubtless has other effects: but its chief effect is the filling the mind and heart and will of him who prays so full of Good Will, that by his resulting action Good Will is done, as apart from the prayer it would not be done. Not my will but Good Will is what in true prayer we most desire. It seeks the positive presence and power of Good Will in us, doing through us and for us, what we alone, or trusting to chance influence, could not or would not do.

Undertaken in pride of race, or pride of opinion, or bride of superior virtue, missions are an injury alike to missionary and convert: but undertaken in the desire to give the best we have in moral motive, in spiritual comfort, in medical skill, in industrial arts, in intellectual interest and power, missions are so essential and consummate an expression of Good Will, that no preacher who fails to preach them, and to train his people to support them, appreciates what Good Will requires of those who would share in its world-wide application. If that Will is good for me, it is good for my neighbor: if it is good for my section of the city, it is good for every section of the city: if it is good for my old and settled community, it is good for the frontier town: if it is good for my country and my race, it is good for every country under heaven, and for all the races of the earth. Granted that Good Will begins at home, and is mainly expressed in secular vocations and domestic and local services: yet if my will stops anywhere short of the ends of the earth it is not Good Will which I am seeking and serving. To carry Good Will where there is most ill will, where the actual situation is most painful, is to come closest to it, to share it most, and serve it best. The Gospel of Good Will requires more sacrifice than the doctrine of the eternal damnation of the heathen ever did. The depth and extent of missionary contribution and devotion, not as a thing apart from secular and home service or as a substitute for it; but as its crown and consummation, will ever be one of the best tests of Good Will.

The minister is no more essential to Good Will than are Church, Bible, Sacrament and Sabbath. There is no miraculously imparted grace of which the priesthood is the custodian and distributor. The minister is the guardian, exponent and teacher of that life in and for Good Will which is common to minister and layman. The minister is related to Good Will in precisely the same way as the butcher is related to meat, or the carpenter to houses, or the shoemaker to shoes. The butcher eats meat, the carpenter lives in a house, the shoemaker wears shoes the same as do other men. But in addition the butcher provides meat, the carpenter houses, the shoemaker shoes for other men. They are simply the specialized agents, set apart to provide these commodities. Precisely so the minister lives in, and by, and for Good Will the same as other Christian men. But in addition to doing that Will for himself, he shows his fellows how to see it, and do it, and enjoy it. He judges himself and all men by the standard of that Will: points out its applications: exhorts to the sacrifices it requires: imparts to all who live in it the hope and comfort it contains.

Just because the function in which he specializes is so precious and vital, the insight requisite is so keen, and the character required to present and represent it worthily is so high, the ministry is a highly honorable profession : but its honor rests on no mysterious superiority. It rests simply and solidly on the worth to the individual and to society of knowing, loving and serving Good Will.

The minister is simply the man who is set apart by society to keep vivid the vision, and active the service, by others as well as by himself, of Good Will. If he does that work well he is entitled to such salary as will give him the tools, the freedom, and the connections required for doing his best ; and to the honor that is due to an important social service cheerfully and effectively rendered.

But he will keep closest to his Master, and come closest to men the less he thinks of the honor, and the professional standing he shares with the lawyer and the physician ; and the more he thinks of the social service rendered, and the spirit of service he shares with the Christian butcher, the Christian carpenter and the Christian shoemaker. The minister like his Master should think of himself chiefly as one who serves.

Other vocations offer larger remuneration, higher honors, more conspicuous careers : but none offers more close companionship with God, or more vital relations with one's fellow-men; none renders more valuable service for the ennobling of individuals, the upbuilding of institutions, the healing of the nations, and the redemption of the world.

This Gospel of Good Will carries with it momentous implications. If this is true, many other things supposed to be true and important are false or trivial. Good Will is not called upon to go out of its way to tear down these trivial falsehoods. It patiently waits to see them fall down as soon as the sufficiency of the Gospel of Good Will is established. Is then this Gospel of Good Will true and sufficient?

The tests are pragmatic. Does it make men Christians? Does it make earth heaven? These tests we may now apply.

A man, in response to Christ's expectation, acquires and maintains the habit of spending his money, controlling his appetites and passions, choosing peace or strife, and making every other decision with an eye single to the greatest good of all who are affected; as the Father who loves all his children will.

Every thought or deed or word that falls below that generous aim he scorns as meanness unworthy of him, and repents as sin.

All men who fall into meanness or sin, the instant they are ashamed and sorry he forgives; and therein finds assurance that God and Christian men likewise forgive his own sins, and restore him to their favor.

He chooses and fulfils his vocation with a justice and generosity which make the interest of client, customer, consumer as precious to him as his own.

He pays whatever price of sacrifice such disinterested devotion to universal good in a world still largely evil may require; accepting that cost as his portion of the cross of Christ.

He thinks little about his own character, his own virtues, his own salvation even: but trusts the Good Will he has toward others to enlarge and enrich his soul into the stature and likeness of Christ.

Where good and evil are mixed, with some of each on both sides of disputed questions, he appreciates the good and opposes the evil in both; giving his influence to the one where, all things considered, he finds most good and least evil.

He joins and supports the church, cherishes its literature, its sacraments, its times and seasons, its worship, its missions, its ministry, not slavishly or superstitiously, but freely and gladly as the appointed agencies for keeping alive and handing on the Gospel of Good Will.

A man who believes and lives this Gospel, whatever else he may believe or not believe, do or refrain from doing, is a Christian.

Wherever and to whatever extent this Gospel is preached and practised, no matter what the racial, intellectual, social, economic or political status, there and to that extent earth becomes a household of heaven.

These fruits the Gospel of Good Will, when clearly preached and faithfully practised, brings forth: and on this power to make men Christian, and earth heaven, it rests its claim to be the true Gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Three Religious Leaders of Oxford and Their Movements: John Wycliffe, John Wesley,
John Henry Newman

By S. PARKES CADMAN

Cloth, 8vo, $2.50

This book deals with three great Englishmen, great Christians, great Churchmen, and loyal sons of Oxford, who, in Dr. Cadman's opinion, are the foremost leaders in religious life and activity that university has yet given to the world. "Many prophets, priests and kings," writes Dr. Cadman, "have been nourished within her borders, but none who in significance and contribution to the general welfare compare with Wycliffe, the real originator of European Protestantism; Wesley, the Anglican priest who became the founder of Methodism and one of the makers of modern England and of English speaking nations; Newman, the spiritual genius of his century, who reinterpreted Catholicism, both Anglican and Roman."

Why Men Pray

By CHARLES LEWIS SLATTERY

Rector of Grace Church, New York City

Cloth, 12mo, $.75

Dr. Slattery defines prayer roughly as "talking with the unseen." In his book he does not argue about prayer but rather sets down in as many chapters six convictions which he has concerning it. These convictions are, first, that all men pray; second, that prayer discovers God, that, in other words, when men become conscious of their prayer they find themselves standing face to face with one whom in a flash they recognize as God; third, prayer unites men; fourth, God depends on men's prayer; fifth, prayer submits to the best; and sixth, prayer receives God.

What Jesus Christ Thought of Himself

By ANSON PHELPS STOKES

Cloth, 12mo.

The purpose of this book is to show in clear, compact form and in untechnical language what any intelligent student of the New Testament may find out for himself as to Jesus's view of his own person. A secondary purpose has been to interpret this self-revealed personality. The author divides his discussion into two main parts: The Human Side of Jesus Christ and The Divine Side of Jesus Christ. Under the former he takes up Christ's consciousness of his limitations, his consciousness that he was representing another and his consciousness of his subordination in prayer. Under the latter he considers Christ as Master of the Past, Master of the Present and Master of the Future. The book concludes with a chapter on the reconciliation of the human and the divine elements.

The Centennial History of the American Bible Society

By HENRY OTIS DWIGHT, LL.D.

Recording Secretary of the Society

In two volumes. Cloth, 8vo

The American Bible Society was organized in May, 1816. Its work has been so interwoven with the development of the American republic that there will be felt a very general interest in this account of its one hundred years of existence. This has been prepared by the Recording Secretary who, for many months, has been engaged in gathering the necessary data and in writing the narrative. The volume will be found full of information not only as to the history of the society but also as to the results achieved in its distribution of the Scriptures throughout this country and in the far ends of the earth.

The Five Great Philosophies of Life

By WILLIAM DEW. HYDE

President of Bowdoin College

Cloth, 12mo, $1.50

The five centuries from the birth of Socrates to the death of Christ produced five principles: The Epicurean pursuit of pleasure; the Stoic law of self-control; the Platonic Plan of Subordination; the Aristotelian Sense of Proportion; and the Christian Spirit of Love. The purpose of this book, which is a revised and considerably enlarged edition of "From Epicurus to Christ," is to let the masters of these sane and wholesome principles of personality talk to us in their own words.

Practical Idealism

By WM. DEWITT HYDE, D.D.

Cloth, 12mo, $1.50

"A book of singular lucidity and of ethical vigor and practical philosophy, utterly free from theological bias, wide in the outlook of keen thought and warm feeling, and admirably interpreting 'the spiritual significance of everyday life.'" — The Outlook.

"Full of much that is intellectually stimulating, and full too, as its title signifies it was meant to be, of much that is practically helpful." — Church Union.

"Whoever reads this volume . . . will concede readily that it deserves the highest commendation. Certainly we recall no other treatise upon its topic which we consider its equal. It is exceedingly concise and compact. It is characteristically candid and large-minded. It outlines its subject with proper concentration of attention upon essential points, and its interest increases to the climax. Its style is unusually lucid and intelligible." — The Congregationalist.

Outlines of Social Theology

- PART I. THEOLOGICAL
- II. ANTHROPOLOGICAL
- III. SOCIOLOGICAL

Cloth, 12mo, $1.50

"It contains something more than commonly well worth reading. The keynote of the volume, as we read it, is sounded in the first sentence of Chapter IV: 'It is impossible to separate God from man or man from God. They are correlative terms.' The author plants himself firmly on this social conception of theology, and holds it. The book is, all through, very much out of the ordinary line. It does not fly in the face of settled convictions, nor contradict the traditional creeds. The subject is set up for discussion in a different light and in new and delightfully suggestive relations."—The Independent.

"A most welcome book. It is something far better and more desirable than its title would indicate. We think he deserves credit for something more thorough and lasting than he is willing to claim. At any rate, he traverses from end to end the whole region of religion, on the side both of theory and of practice, and explores it in the light of the science and thinking and spirit of our day. The author's gift of telling utterance, his fine feeling, and lofty purpose seem never to fail him. He shows that he has in rare degree the gifts of the preacher, and that these chapters were first spoken as sermons. They lose in print none of their reality and practical efficiency. It is a good omen that this first attempt at a thorough restatement of Christian doctrine should command the service of the art to please and convince, and partake both of the 'grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ.'"—The Congregationalist.
